

METANORA,

THE FOREST KING.

BEADLE AND COMPANY, 98 WILLIAM STREET, N. Y. Am. News Co., 119 & 121 Nassau St., N. Y.

A STRANGE TEST!

woman's fate: a man's hate: a father's will: an agent's villainy: a ung wood-rover's inflexible purpose: a young Indian chief's remarkable devotion—all are leading features of

Beadle's Dime Novels, No. 205,

TO ISSUE TUESDAY, JUNE 7, viz.:

THE GRAY SCALP;

OR,

THE BLACKFOOT BRAVE.

BY EDWARD WILLETT,

AUTHOR "HUNTER'S PLEDGE," "BORDER FOES," "NED STARLING," ETC

The new interest which recent issues of this FAVORITE SERIES has created, this capital novel will highten.

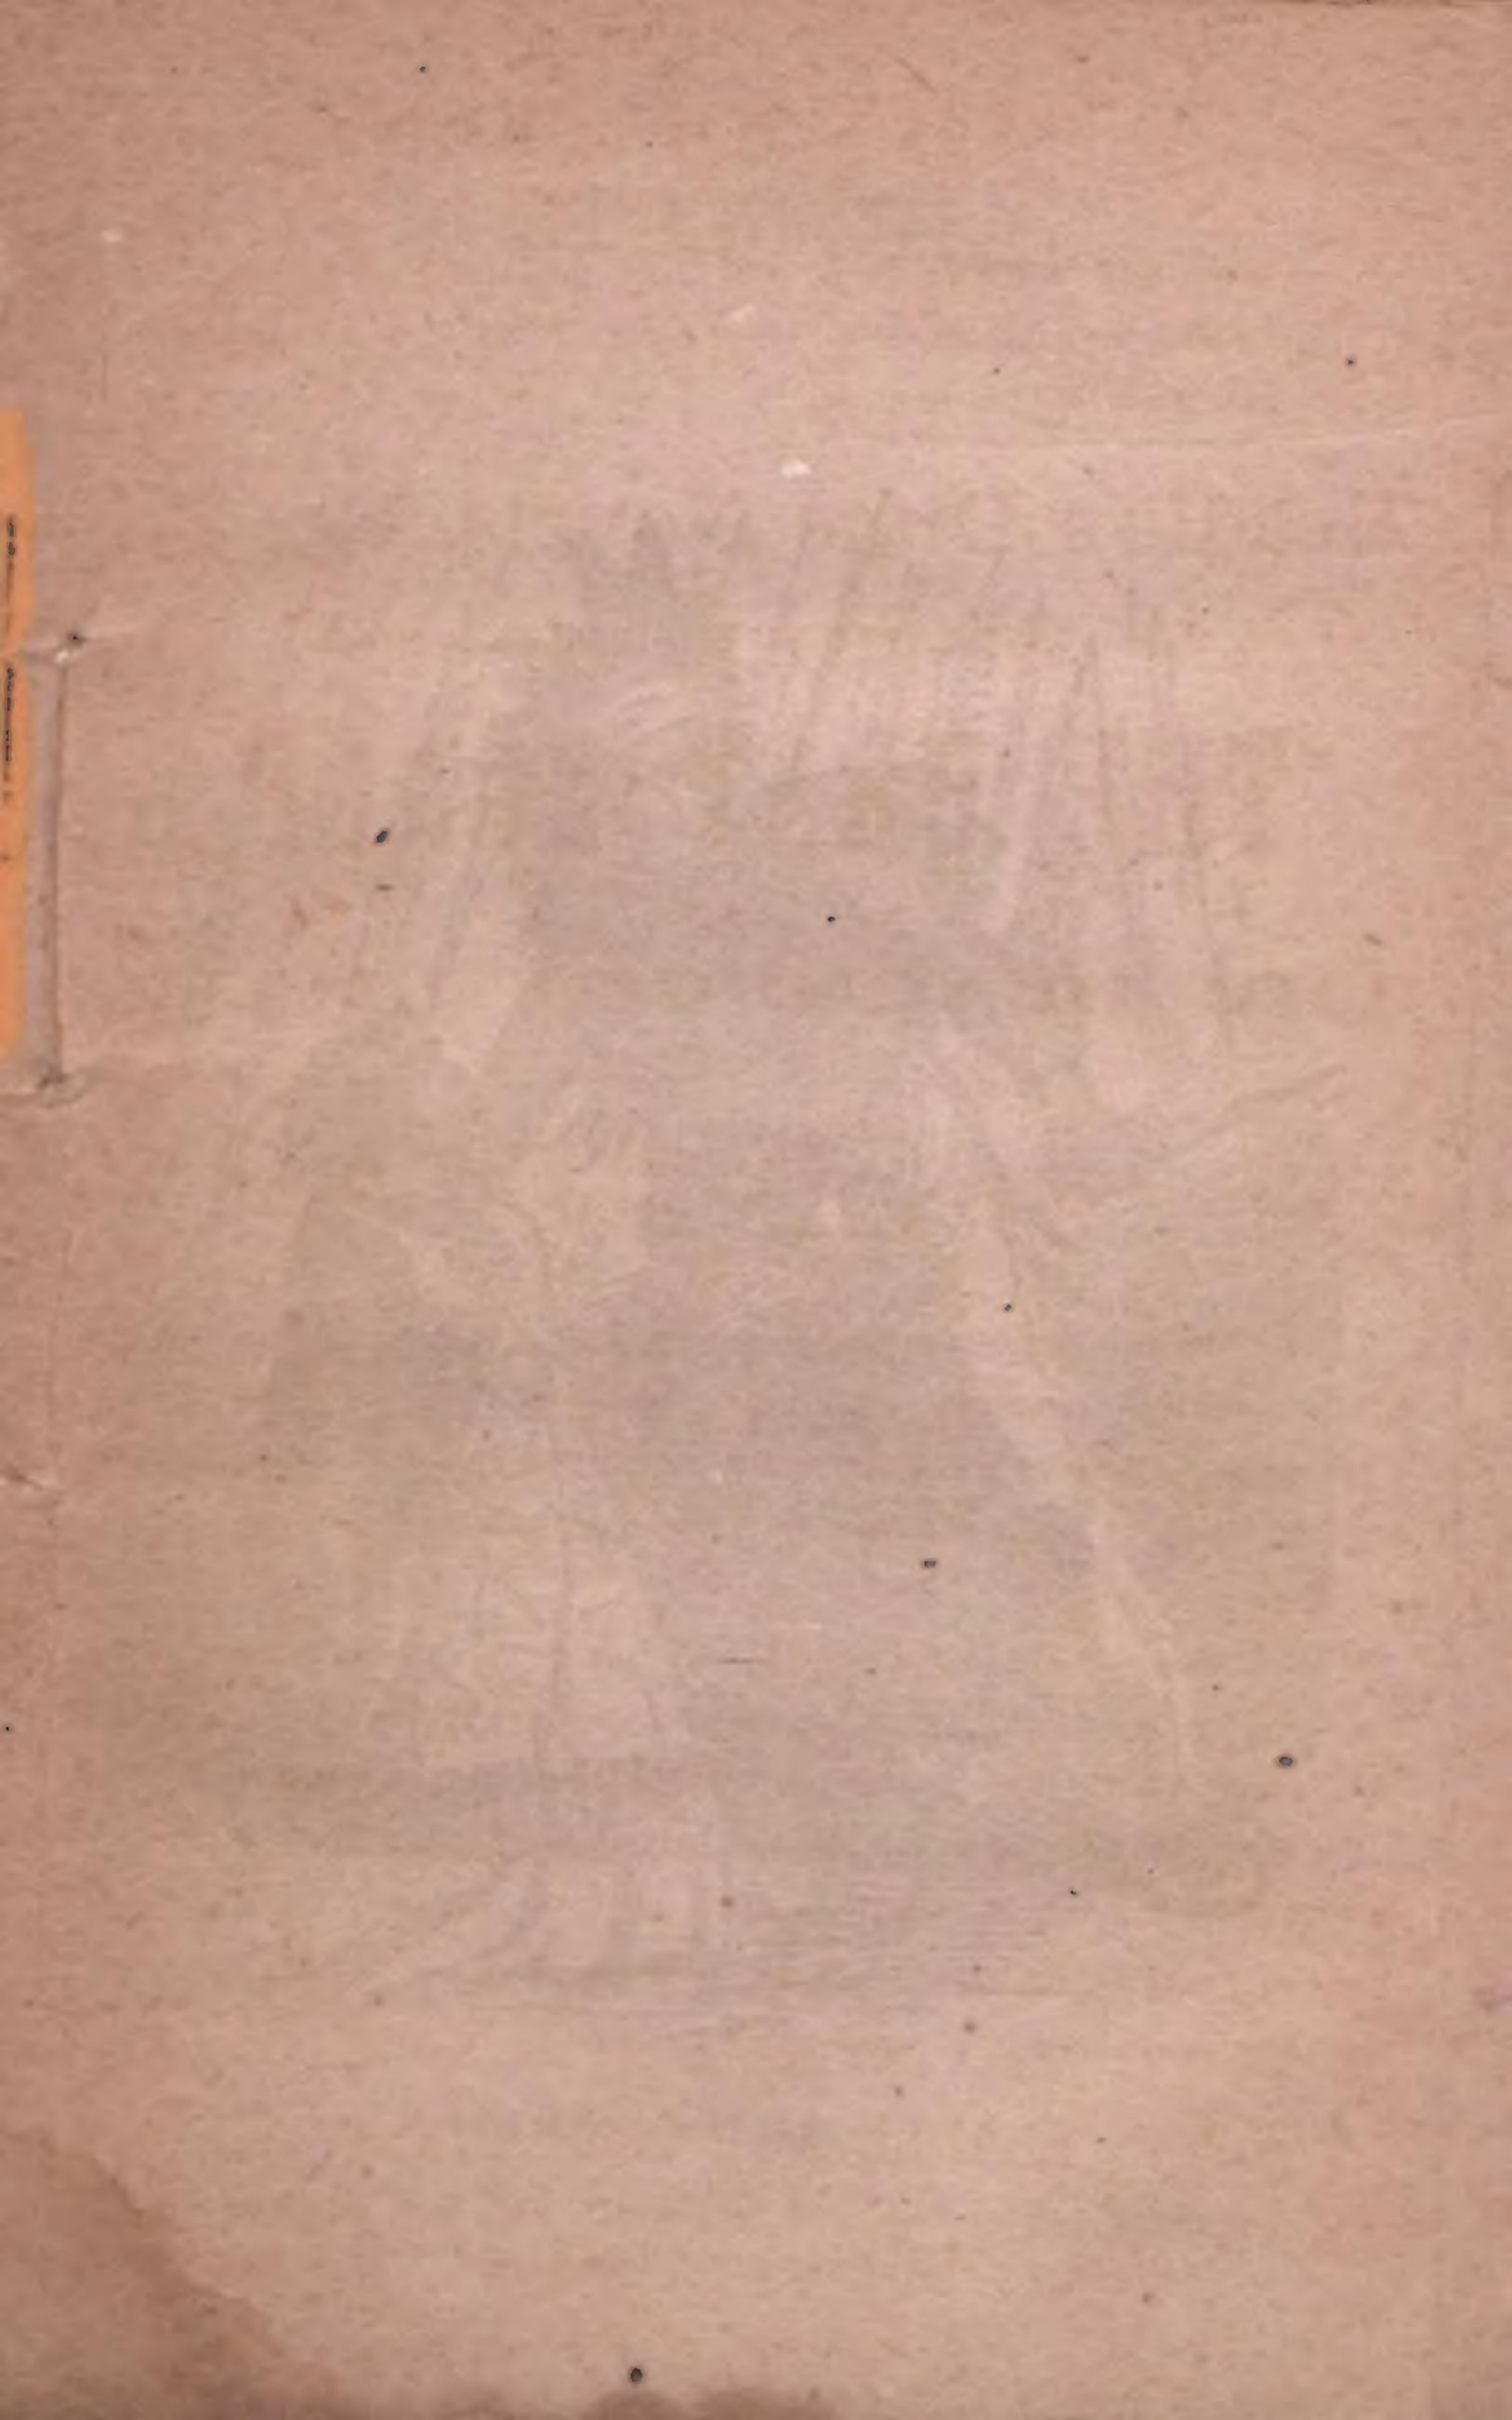

In its several episodes of the camp, the forest and the trail—of daring and devotion—of flerce combat and long race for life—it is especially impressive.

The Blackfoot brave is a splendid specimen of the race of "savages undelfiled" by contact with civilization, showing what the "poor Indian" might have been if he had been permitted to maintain his native nobility.

The Gray Scalp plays a peculiar role in this story, and around it hang an interest and mystery which the author most happily develops.

For sale by all Newsdealers and Booksellers; or sent, post-paid, to my address, on receipt of price-Ten Cents.

BEADLE AND COMPANY, Publishers,
98 William Street, New York.

METAMORA,

THE SEC

FOREST KING.

,有知去可以以及心证方法一位了提出证明

Track white and the property of 11-5-5302 x755

THE PARTY OF THE P

BY CAPT. FRANK ARMSTRONG.

AMOUNT

DEW YORK:

BEADLE AND COMPANY, PUBLISHERS,

98 WILLIAM STREET.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1870, by

BEADLE AND COMPANY,

In the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

SHE

(No. 204.)

METAMORA, THE FOREST KING.

CHAPTER I.

THE PLYMOUTH SCOUT.

High up on the crest of the hill that encircled Plymouth town-in the little grave-yard where rested the bones of some of the Pilgrim Fathers-stood a stalwart man, gazing down upon the sea-shore. Though a white man yet he was clad in a motley garb, half Puritan, half Indian. He wore the somber-colored doublet so common to the colonists, but his lower limbs were incased in the buck-skin leggins of the savage, curiously ornamented with porcupine-quills, stained with various pigments. The broad leather belt that girded his waist, supported a heavy hunting-knife, whose long, keen blade was not hid by a sheath. Upon his feet were the moccasins of the redman, although his head was protected by the broad-brimmed hat of the Puritans. The woodman-for such he evidently was-was quite a young man-probably not over twenty-five, . with a frank face and a pleasant smile. His large brown eyes -that looked black ten paces off-were honest ones-eyes that looked straight at either friend or foe. His brown hair was cropped tightly to the head, Puritan fashion. This man was known as Enoch Andrews-renowned throughout all the colony as a master of wood-craft though young in years. Andrews had come as a boy to New England, and instinctively had taken to the wild life of the forest. A splendid shot with the rifle-a keen eye on the trail, and brave as a lion, not a red warrior of New England but acknowledged him as a peer. The elders of the colony-although at first frowning upon the wayward youth, who knelt not at prayer, dressed not in their sober garb, but preferred the freedom of the woods to the restraints of civilization, soon grew to respect him. When the fierce Narraganset warriors poured like a blast of flame upon the unprotected whites, and the smoke of their burning dwellings filled the air, Enoch Andrews' rifle did good service, and many a plumed chief bit the dust, stricken unto death by the ball of the woodman. Then, too, Andrews led the New-England troops through the pathless forest to the stronghold of the red-men, and thus enabled them to deal that terrible blow which broke the power of the Narraganset tribe, and relieved Plymouth of a dreaded foe. Conanshet, sachem of the Narragansets, was killed in the fight by Andrews in a fair hand-to-hand encounter—an event that gave the victory to the colonists, for the Indians fled in dismay at the death of their chief.

So, throughout the colony the brave Enoch was honored, his wayward ways were all forgotten, and proudly the settlers termed him the "Plymouth Scout."

Andrews had been absent from the village for some time on a hunting-excursion to the Connecticut, and therefore the sight on the beach below surprised him. Some arrival of importance, evidently, for all the elders of the colony were there headed by Sir Guy Godalmin, the Governor.

And it was indeed as the scout had surmised. Lord Fitzarnold, the newly commissioned successor to Sir Guy, had just landed from the ship in the harbor, and was then being introduced to the assembled dignitaries.

"Some one of rank, evidently," he said, as, leaning on his rifle, he watched the landing of the splendidly-dressed nobleman. "He looks like a soldier," he continued. "If what I have heard among the Mohawks and the Nipmucks be true, regarding Metamora's designs upon the colony, we shall need all the soldiers that we can muster. I would like to see land a half-thousand more just like him!"

"The white brave speaks with a straight tongue," said a deep, guttural voice close at the elbow of the woodman. Andrews turned in some little astonishment and beheld an Indian standing by his side. The approach of the red-man had been so noiseless, that even the keen car of the scout had not detected it.

With curiosity Andrews looked upon the Indian. The features of the savage were strangely familiar, and yet, for the moment, the scout could not remember where he had met the chief.

The Indian was dressed in the usual deer-skin garb peculiar to the red-men, and though the style and trimming of the dress showed plainly to the experienced eye of Andrews that he belonged to Metamora's tribe—the Wampanoags, yet the scout could not remember that he had ever met the man before him, in their wigwams. There were few chiefs, too, of the Wampanoags, of any note, that Andrews did not know.

"My white brother does not remember the red chief," said the Indian, as he noticed the puzzled look of the scout.

"Well—no, chief," replied Andrews, somewhat astonished that he could not remember; "I can't say that I do renember you, and yet your face and voice both are familiar to me."

"Does my brother remember the big river many sleeps from here?" asked the savage, and he waved his hand toward the west as he spoke.

"The Connecticut?" questioned Andrews.

" Yes."

The scout nodded in the affirmative.

"Many moons ago a brave of the Mohegan tribe met the king of the forest—the black bear—in single fight. The brave was a great warrior-many scalps of the Narraganset and Mohawk hung in his wigwam. The brave killed the bear but his flesh was torn by the claws and teeth of the forest chief. The red-man laid down to die by the side of the swift waters -he sung his death-song and waited for the big sleep to come. But, Manitou was not ready to place the red chief in the shappy hunting-grounds. He sent a pale-face warrior to aid the red-man. The pale-face bathed the wounds of the Mohegan chief-bound them up with strips of deer-skin, and gave him fire-water to drink. The heart of the red-man is big; ne Jemembers the white chief that saved his life, though the ciner has forgotten him." - Then the Indian extended his hand toward the scout, to greet him after the fashion of the whites. Andrews grasped the hand warmly.

"Agawam, the Moliegan chief!" cried the scout, who now remembered the man whose life he had saved.

"No!" responded the chief. "The rattlesnake changes his skin, so the red chief has changed his name—changed also his tribe! Many moons ago, by the big fresh river—the Connecticut—the chief was called Agawam, and was a brave of the Mohegans Now, he is called Namattah, and is a Wampanoag."

The scout looked at the Indian in astonishment. For a red-man to change his name and tribe was something wonderful, and Andrews, with all his experience in the customs of the red-men, had never come across a similar instance.

"I can not understand my red brother," said the scout.

"Wah! it is plain," returned the savage. "Mohegan once, Wampanoag now. Let my brother forget Agawam and remember Namattah."

"Certainly, chief, if you request it," replied Andrews.

"My brother's heart is large—his arm strong—his head big," said the Indian, gravely. "The white chief saved the life of the red-man when he could have crushed him like a worm by stepping on him. The Indian is the foe of the paleface, yet the white chief did not strike him when he was helpless."

"That's just the reason, chief," replied Andrews. "I don't strike a man when he's down. If you and I had met in the forest on equal terms, then it would have been your top-knot or mine. But, when I found you bleeding to death by the side of the river, why I would have been a mean coward indeed to have taken advantage of your helpless condition."

"The red-man remembers long time; he will not forget the kindness of the pale-face."

"Let that pass, chief," responded Andrews, bluntly. "I wouldn't leave a dog to die, helpless and in misery, if I could aid it, much less a human being—for we're all human, red or white."

"Good!" said the Indian, sententiously. "Let my brother open his ears, and listen; the chief will speak words that will burn like fire."

"Say on!" Andrews was somewhat astonished at the strange words of the chief.

"My brother knows of Metamora, chief of the Wampanoags?" asked the savage.

"Yes," replied the scout, "the chief whom we call King Phillip."

"My brother speaks straight," said the savage. "King Philip, the chief of the Wampanoags, leads a thousand warriors. Metamora, the Forest King of New England, leads ten thousand warriors."

"What do you mean, chief?" asked the scout.

"The red-men of New England are about to meet in council, and Metamora is to be chosen king." The dark eyes of the savage flashed as he mentioned the name of the red chief, whose time as a warrior was already so great as to win for him the title of the Forest King.

"Are you sure of this, chief?" asked Andrews, and his exprienced mind saw instantly how great the change would be should any such action take place. The colony could easily cope with any single tribe, but, should a confederation take place, it would put into the field as foes every red-skin from Saco to the Connecticut.

"Namattah speaks straight," replied the Indian, proudly.
"The red chiefs meet in council at Pocasset to-night. Metamora will be chosen king, the war-hatchet dug up, and the red braves will take the sealps of the white-skins."

"Are all the tribes in league with Metamora and the Wam-panoars?" asked the scout, thoughtfully.

"All but the Mohawks and Mohegans. They fight for the long-knives," replied the Indian.

"Chief, I thank you for this intelligence," said Andrews, carnestly; "this timely warning will save many of my white brothers. So, chief, the debt you owe me is canceled."

"No, not while the blood is in heart of the red brave!" cried the Indian, warmly. "Metamora is a great chief—the king. Ariwam—though now a dog of the Wampanoags—is Molegan at heart; he kates the chief of the Wampanoags! The blood of Metamora shall redden his knife, and his scalplack shall hang at his belt!" The Indian spoke with flery posion. Andrews looked upon him with amazement. That the Indian should voluntarily leave his tribe, renounce his have and join a nation whose chief he hated so bitterly, was a fields. Enoch guessed that there must be some strong motive for all this, but what that motive was he could not divine.

"My brother will prepare the white-skins for the attack of the red-men?" the Indian asked.

"Yes," answered the scout; "but how can I learn the par-

"The council to-night will decide," replied the chief. "I will see my brother to-morrow and tell him all. Will my brother be here to-morrow at this time?"

" Yes."

"Good! He shall know." And then the Indian departed.

"This will be news indeed!" exclaimed An hews, as he descended the hill to the town. The cavalence from the head, had preceded him. Lord Fitzarnold, having accepted the proffer of Sir Guy's hospitality, turned to ascend the hill facing the landing, when his eyes fell upon a mailen of sich rare and exquisite beauty, that, forgetful of his surroundings, he paused and gazed upon her in astonishment.

"I did not think to behold one so beautiful on these will shores," he said.

Sir Guy smiled, and a flush of undisquised pleasure crimconed his face, as he called:

"Come hither, Maud."

The blushing girl advanced.

"This, Lord Fitzarnold, is my daughter Mand.

"Your daughter, Sir Guy! Then happy am I to have accepted of your hospitality if it brings me her society. Lady, will you honor me with your arm?"

The timid Maud, quite frightened by such a compliment, took the proffered arm.

"How beautiful you are!" whispered the lor! Freel to the dissolute court of the gay Charles II, where conquiments were simply court language, he showered the poor child with such expressive flatteries as quite astounded her, conquite Sir Guy to the rescue.

"Bred in this far away place, my lord, my daughter is unused to courtly phrace; so you must e'en a relive her all act. She will know thee better upon acquaintance!"

"That she shall! the forest flower!" he an were!, lining her hand to his lips.

Upon which act Mand showed unmistaltable signs of ils-

And so did Reulen Esmond, Sir Guy's secretary, who had been present at the reception. Hearing the clerate species of Lord Pitzarnold evidently had not made him a happing man.

"Confound his in oudence!" he muttered. "Here have I known Miss Mand ryears, yet never have presumed up a such liberties! He will bear watching!"

CHAPTER II.

THE FOREST KING.

The mantle of night had descended upon the earth. The still waters of the little pond of Wattuper in Poeasset (now the town of Tiverton) reflected back the dim light of the stars, which began to appear singly, one by one, in the dark-blue sky. The croak of the frogs in the marshes by the little sheet of water and the dismal cries of the night-birds were the only some is that broke on the still air. And yet the woods by the pand were full of life—human life:

In the center of the wood was a little open space—mature's clearing—now filled with the rulely-constructed wigwams of the red-men. Five hundred painted warriors were in the woods of Pocasset.

Metam ra, the Forest King, was about to hold a grand council.

The council-lodge was erected in the center of the little clearing; in a circle, surrounding it, were the lodges of the warriers.

The council-lodge was well filled by the red chiefs. A fire blazing in the center cast its glare upon the ducky forms that surrounded it, and gave light for the council.

The warriors were seated in a circle around the fire. Metamora, seated upon a bear-skin, towered a head above the other chiefs. Well had be been named the Forest King. Not a brave was there in all New England that could cope single-leaded with the Warapanoag chief. Few men, even among the whites, could handle the rifle as well as he. And tall, stort and muschbras he was, yet his tread was like the tread of the cut, and supple and willy as that animal was he.

Not only was Metamora renowned on the war-path, but in come it also. The whites had early discovered that this chief was no common savare, but a man of brains and skill, though his skin was red, and the wild forest had been the school in which he had been reared. The whites had aptly named him

King Philip, and the Macedonian conqueror was not disgraced by his New-England namesake.

Metamora, from boyhood, had detested the pale-faced stringers, who were so slowly but surely driving his race back from the "Big Salt Lake," as the Wampanoags termed the ocean. The sagacious savage soon discovered that it was useless for a single tribe to war upon the whites. The overwhelming defeats of the Pequods and Narragansets had convinced him of that.

The able chieftain then resolved to unite all of the New-England tribes in a grand confederation, and then attack their enemy at all points at the same time.

So, to the council in the woods of Pocasset came the chief braves of the Pawtuckets, the Nipmacks, the Sacos, the Tarranteens, and the Narragansets, besides representatives from other tribes. The Mohawks and the Mohagans alone refers to join in the confederation, and remained faithful to their treaties with the colonists.

One by one the chiefs had risen in the council-lodge and pledged their warriors to Metamora. The messengers that had been sent to stir up the distant tribes against the common foe, made their reports.

Then the Forest King rose, and as he began to speak, there was silence in the council-lodge, and the red warriors leaded forward anxiously, to catch the words of the great chief.

"Sachems, chiefs and warriors," began Metamera, in the full, deep voice that had won him such renown as an erater, "Metamora has told his brothers of the many insults and aggressions of the pale-faces. He has told them that the heart of the white man is like his face, pale and without his life."

A hum of approval went round the circle of dark hims, as they listened to these words.

"The white man talks of peace," continued the warrier, "but Metamora tells his brothers that their it's cance, as still landing from over the Big Salt Lake, fills I with rinks, then-der-gans, and their long knives of war. What are these is related the red chief swept his dark eye around the chiefe of these as he asked the question. "Metamora will tell his in thers. They are to drive the red-man from his lands—short him down like the deer-herd and fire his wigwam."

Many a dark eye in the circle of chiefs flashed fire, many a hand grasped the handle of the hunting-knife, as the full voice of the red chief thundered out the charge against the English settlers.

"What shall the red-man do?" demanded the chief. "Shall le crouch like the dog who is beaten? No! let him arouse and scream like the eagle when the snake seeks his nest! Let him rush upon his foe—protect the land of his fathers. Let the keen edge of the ax of vengeance defend the squaws and doves of the red-men from the fire-hail of the white-skins! Let the red-men of New England dig up the war-hatchet and bury it not again while the track of the high moccasin insults the graves of our fathers!"

The effect of this fiery speech could easily be seen in the ferce eyes and passion-moved faces of the red braves.

When Metamora had finished and again taken his seat, an old chief arose.

Wampanoags, who is as wise as the serpent and as brave as the eagle. The words of Metamora are good—his brothers have listened with open cars, and they have sunk deep into their hearts. The red-men of New England will rise in their might and drive the long-knives into the Big Salt Lake. They will strike all together from the Penobscot to the Connecticut, and Metamora, the lion chief, shall be our king. Mog Magone is the great chief of the Saco tribe, but he and his warriers will follow the lead of Metamora."

Then the chief of the Sacos resumed his seat. The loud hum of approval told how well the braves of the council had received his words.

Briefly the delegates from the other tribes tendered their warriors to the Wampanoag chief and acknowledged him as their sovereign. And ere the council was done, the details of the rising were perfected.

With a heart beating high with joy at the success of his plans, after the council Metamora sought his lodge.

In the holge of the red chief—which was dimly lighted by a little fire blazing in its center—sat an Indian girl, by a bear-ship couch on which lay an infant, wrapped in skins. The infant was evidently ailing, and the Indian girl—its mother—watched it with easer eyes. The Indian mail was called Manneokee. The flower was she of the Wampaneags, and the wife of the great chief, Metamora.

In person the Indian girl was fair to look upon, although her skin was dark, colored by her Indian block. But her black, lustrous eyes were brightness itself; her step as limit many young fawn's that roamed through the Plymouch we also aer form as perfect as ever sculptor carve tout of slight manble, yet possessing all the subtle grace of the charlest vincing was little wonder that Nameokee had caught the tancy of the Forest King.

Metamora started in surprise when he entered his wigwam and beheld his wife by the side of the sick child. The chief had been absent for two days, and had returned jut in time to participate in the council, so that he had not seen his wife and child for some little time.

"Nameokee, what ails our young dove?" cried the chief, in alarm.

"The pale-faces upset my cance on the Salt Lake. I have my child to land, but I fear that he will never again smile upon his mother," sadily replied Nameokee.

Metamora's brows grew dark and his eyes flashed thre as he listened to the story of the cruel outrage.

"Ugh!" cried the chief, in his deep tenes, "Nameshae is a water-bird in the stream; but the white man is an allig tor, and the chief of the Wampanongs will hunt him—hunt him to his very nest, and feed the crow tribes on the flesh of his young!" Terrible was the expression on the face of the rel chief as he uttered the menacing words.

"Metamora, look!" cried Nameokee, in dismay, as she gazed upon the quivering form of the infint, "cur y is g brave sickens from the water, and shakes like the aspendation

"So shall the father of the white child shake when Mann mora comes and howls in his wigwam!" cried the Hing, therealy.

"No, no, Metamora, do not seek the wijwam of the pale-faces!" exclaimed Nameokee, in alarm. "They are its age-they will kill thee!" —

"Nameobice is a squaw," returned the chief; "it is but natural that she should feur. Metamora is a warrior, and does not know what fear is?" and the chief drew himself up providy. "The white man brings mines of powder across the Big Sit Lake, many arms and warriors. What are these for but to drive the red-man from his home and destroy his race forever? This he will do even if the red braves show him the pips of peace instinct of the tomahawk."

Then the infant lying on the couch of skins moved its little from convolvively—a gas p or two, and the spirit of the young trave of the Wampanougs fled from the cold earth to the Lappy laming grounds of the red-men. The child of Metamora was dead.

Stern was the hown upon the forchead of the chief as he look has been been boy and the weeping mother.

"The call waters of the Salt Lake have chilled his heart—the call hand of the dark shadow is upon him," sail the Indian chief, saily. And then, when he thought of the authors of the wrong, all the fire of his Indian blood leaped into being. "The white man has caused this!" he cried. "The blood of Metanora rises in his veins like the waters in the manths of our rivers, but it shall not fall like them—not not till the rock it springs from is swept away!"

Numbered guested some fearful meaning in the words of the red brave.

"The words of Melamora are strange-Nameokee can not understand them."

"Listen, Name shoe, and let the words of the red chief sink depints the Lead," soil the Porest King. "Metamora has a the trib sof the pule-faces grow bir and flourish, and his heat was each. The shadow of the white man is too big—it share out the sam line from the Indian. The sound of the ax has sear I the deer from the hunting-grounds. But Metamora will have no more. He has talked with his red brothern, a it to be the given with him. But he a moon is over the verification will be unbaried, and the order of many white have seal.

The whites.

for a serious of a little of the serious of the ser

"Their numbers are like the springing grass. The red-men are weak—their tribes are small. They will be swept away by the thunder-guns of the white man."

"Nameokee is a squaw, and her heart is weak," replied the chief. "The tribes of New England have made Metamora their king, and will raise the war-hatchet against the whites. The pale-faces shall be driven to their lands across the Big Salt Lake. Their scalps shall hang and blacken in the smoke of the red-man's lodges."

"Our young brave has fled to the spirit-land," murmured the mother, sadly.

"Weep not, Namcokee," responded the chief; "Le is in Manitou's bosom. He will look down from the happy hunting-grounds and rejoice when he sees the red-men burst like a flame-cloud upon the long-knives. Terrible shall be the vengeance of Metamora for the loss of his young brave."

That night the Wampanoags sung the death-song over the son of Metamora, and deadly was the vengeance which they swore to execute upon the pale-faces. The storm-cloud was gathering fast—soon the lightning would burst from it.

CHAPTER III.

THE DECISION OF THE ELDERS.

In the parlor of Sir Guy Godalmin's house sat Lord Fitz-arnold, Sir Guy, and the elders of the colony.

The sober elders were greatly pleased with their hew Governor. They had fored the arrival of some gay, licentics cavalier, who—fresh from Charles' court—might attempt to ingraft some of its vices upon the colony. But Lord Filenand was no young, light-pated cavaller, but evidently a stern, haughty soldier. Therefore the minds of the goodly elders were greatly relieved.

The company were engaged in general conversation, when a servant entered the room, bearing the message that the Plymouth scout, Enoch Andrews, desired to see Sir Guy Godal-min on particular business.

Do

"Admit him instantly," said Sir Guy.

The servant departed.

"The Plymouth scout!" said Lord Fitzarnor, in a tone of wonder; "and who is he?"

"A woodman, my lord," answered Sir Guy, "of rare know-ledge regarding the red heathens by whom we are surrounded. The best Indian-fighter in the colony, for he fears not to penetrate into the very haunts of the savages. I'll lay my life, my lord, that he comes to tell us of some new plot against the peace of the colony devised by these savages."

The entrance of the scout into the room put a stop to Sir

Gay's speech.

"Welcome, Enoch!" exclaimed one of the elders, as the

"Ay, heartily glad !" cried Sir Guy; "you have been absent from Plymouth for some time."

"Yes, Sir Guy," answered the woodman, "on a hunting expedition to the Connecticut."

"And what news bring you from the woods, Enoch? Are the red heathen likely to again assail our borders?" demanded Sir Guy.

"Perhaps, Sir Guy, my news were better told to you alone," responded the scout.

- -

"Oh, no; speak out!" exclaimed Godalmin: "here are none but the elders of our colony, and this gentleman is our new Governor, whom our gracious king has been pleased to sen! among us—Lord Fitzarnold."

With a simple inclination of the head Enoch acknowledge I the respect he owed to the lord, the representative of royalty. For, treth to say, he cared little for titles, and the haughty air of Fitzarnold did not impress the simple woodman favorally.

" As you please, sir," said the scout.

"Is there danger, friend Enoch, that the savages will again attack us?" asked Sir Guy.

"Yes," replied the woodman.

"From what quarter will the danger come? From the Narragansets?"

"Yes; not only from them, but from every tribe from the Connecticut to the Penobscot."

The words of the sport burst upon the cars of the listeners like a thunder-clap. The faces of the claers grew seriors at the intelligence. They knew full well that Andrews never spoke heedlessly, and without full information.

"Will the savages break their treaties with the colony, then?" asked Sir Gay, and his grave face showed how important he considered the news.

"All, except the Mohegans and the Mohawks," answered the scout; "not another tribe is to be trusted."

"This is indeed serious," said Sir Guy; "but are you sare that there is no mistake? It seems strange that all the tilles, except the Mohawks and the Mohegans, should take up arms against us."

"There is little room for doubt, Sir Guy," replied the scout; "nearly all the tribes of New England have formed a confideration against the colony."

"And who is the leader—the moving spirit of this dangerous alliance?" asked Sir Guy.

"Metamora, chief of the Wampanoass," answered the scout.

"King Philip!" cried the elders, in a breath.

The name of Metamora was indeed a spell to raise the demon, Terror, in the minds of the coloni ts. The whites of New England had no fee that they dreaded more than the chief of the Wampanongs.

"This is news indeed!" exclaimed Sir Guy.

"Metamora is—or will be—chosen king of all the New-England tribes. Then the tomahawk is to be dug up and the rel chiefs take the war-path against the colony."

Grave now were the faces of the elders. It was plien that, if the secut's intelligence be true—and none don'tellit—the confed ration headed by Metamora would deal the columbs the most terrible flow that they ever hal received

"We must prepare to meet this atmek," said Sir Gy, thoughtfally. "Enoch, know you where this Metamora is to be found?"

"Yes," answere I the rout; "he is now in the week of Pocasset. The Indians Lold a grand compatibility to right."

"Will you bear a message, friend Enoch, to this red chief from the elders of the colony?—that is, if you think you can do so without endangering your life, for it would be but foelish ra-larges to expose there to certain death," said Sir Guy.

"Willingly," replied the woodman; "there is little danger now. A week hence there may be much."

"Now, gentlemen, and you, my lord, I pray you listen to me. My plan is to hold a council, to which we will invite this chief—ask his grievances, and if pessible make a new treaty with him," said Sir Gay.

The elders gravely lowed assent.

"Why not muster our ferces and crush these reptiles?"

asked Fitzarnold, haughtily.

- "A difficult task, my lord," replied Sir Guy. "There savnyes know every foot of the forest, which to our soldiers is a trackless will time.s. Bosides, the red-men are ten to one. It is better that we purchase peace until this confederation is broken up, and then, at our opportunity, we can strike the red heathen, tribe by tribe."
- "Yes, my lord," said one of the claims, "Sir Guy speaks well. Let us hold a council, and if possible learn from this King Philip, his designs. If we charge him openly with the intent to make war upon us, he will then see that we know his intentions. Thes Indians are like tigers: they attack secretly; but if they now find that we are prepared for them, they may pause in the attack."

"As you please, gentlemen," said Fitzarnold; "I yield to

"Well, friend Ensein, bear the message to-morrow to this red chief, that on Thursday next we will hold a council, and desire his presence."

" I'll do so, Sir Gey," replied the secut.

"Think you that he will come!" askel Fitzarnold.

" Not a doubt of it, my lord," replied S.r Gay.

Then the ciders and the scout departed, and an hour afterward it was he we all over Plymeath town that the dreaded First Hing would soon again be on the war-path against the Willies.

Many a mother husbel her babe to sleep that night with the name of Mannera upon her white lips.

CHAPTER IV.

LOVE'S TOUNG DREAM.

When Maud reached the house on the return from the beach, she was glad of the opportunity to escape from the arm of the courtly Fitzarnold, to whom, in a few brief minutes, she had taken a mortal dislike. Strange it was, teo; for Lord Gilbert Fitzarnold was generally a favorite with the bidies, and bore a high reputation as a gallant in the English court. But, his soft speeches and open flattery had not impressed Maud favorably; rather they bad made her shrink from him. Why she should have taken such a sudden dislike to the courtly gentleman whom she had known but a few brief minutes, she herself, probably, would have found difficult to explain. But, dislike him she did, and glad was she when the arrival at her father's house gave her the desired opportunity to escape from his company.

Maud was not the only one that had taken a sudden dislike to Lord Gilbert. The humble secretary, Reuben Esmond, looked not upon the new Governor with favorable eyes. Unlike Maud, however, Reuben could have easily told why he hated Fitzarnold, for hate him he did.

Reuben felt in no mood to sit in the presence of the man he detested; so he betook himself to the garden at the back of the house, where, casting himself upon the grass, under a pear-tree, he rested his head upon his hands and thought—thought of what? Ah! it is difficult to answer that question, for in the day-dreams of the humble secretary were many a wild hope—many an earnest longing.

The rustle of a dress startled Reuben from his reveries. Starting to his feet, he saw Maud Godalmin coming down the garden walk, a book in her hand.

"Am I a wizard, that she appears at my thought?" crie! Reuben to himself, as he beheld the fair daughter of Sir Gay, for, if the truth be told, Reuben Esmond had been wishing with all his heart for Maud to come. Perhaps Sir Gay Esmond should dare to think so much of his Maud, had he been apprised of the fact. Reuben had no fortune but his brains and his strong arms—poor gifts, commonly, when weighed against gold and rank. Yet Reuben Esmond loved the daughter of proud Sir Guy Godalmin. He had not dared to own, even to himself, that he loved, until this haughty stranger had fixed his bold eyes upon her and addressed his fulsome compliments to her ear. Then the truth flashed at once to the mind of the humble secretary. He loved his employer's daughter—loved the girl that there was little hope of his ever winning.

Reuben Esmond was not only poor, but lowly-born—the son of a sailor father, who had died at sea, and of a mother who, stricken with grief, did not long survive the husband's death.

Cast empty-handed upon the world when scarce fifteen, young Esmond battled manfully for existence. At last he found a haven in the household of Sir Guy. Years passed and he had grown to man's estate, side by side with blooming Maud.

Was it a wonder that he had learned to love the fair girl—he that had neither kith nor kin in the world to love? It is human nature to love. The instinct is in our own being; conquer it we can not—submit to it we must.

And so Reuben Esmond loved Maud Godalmin.

CHAPTER V.

THE STATUE BECOMES A WOMAN.

"How beautiful she is!" cried Reuben, as Maud advanced toward him. "There is but one way to destroy this hopeless passion, and that is to leave her forever. Away from her I may forget her, or if not her, forget the fatal, hopeless love that she has inspired."

"Reuben!" cried Maud, in her clear, gleefal voice, as she came toward him. "I have been looking for you. Won't you come and read for me in the library a little while?"

"Certainly," replied the youth, looking into the fair face of the girl, and discovering new beauties in it that his eyes had never seen before.

"You have a great deal of patience with my tire-ame requests, Reuben," said Mand; "you never e-mplain, yet I am sure that I must weary you sometimes."

"No, no!" quietly replied the secretary; "it is a pleasure for me to oblige you."

"That is what you always say," cried Much. "Rubn, you are the best-natured fellow in the world, and Fin a re I ought to love you dearly."

"I hope you will!" exclaimed Reuben, quickly, and with an intonation that a moment after he regrected, for Mand's quick car caught the sound—the method of expression that soil far more than the simple words. For a moment Mand's eyes rested on the open, honest face of Reuben; she saw at one that he had betrayed himself. Then a little bit of oil or hosted up into her temples, and she let her eyes full upon the group h

"He loves me!" Maud murmired to here if. Sing had guessed the truth at once.

Reuben would have given something to have recalled his words, but it was too late; the mischief was done, if mischief there was.

"This will probably be the last time that I shall read to you," said the secretary, breaking the somewhat embarrasing silence.

"The last time!" cried Mand, in surprise, again railing her eyes and gazing at the young man's face.

"I am about to leave your father's service," replied R. Jen, "to go out into the world to seek my fortune."

"Why is this?" asked Mand. "Are you not confinable here?"

"Yes, and no," replied Reuben.

"What a strange answer! Explain!" cried Man', earn-

"Is not the reason plain?" whel Realen, evalvely. "I wish to better my position—to carve out my fortune. That I can not do while I remain here, your father's recretary."

- 'Have you told my father that you are about to leave him?" she asked, after a moment's silence.
 - " No."
 - "Is not this then a sudden resolution?"
- "Yes," he answered, "quite sudden; for an hour ago I did not dream of it."

The answer puzzled Mand. What could have has pened in a single hour to cause this sudden determination?

"Realen, we have grown up from childhood tegether—you have always been like a brother to me and I can not bear the thought that we should part," she said, carnestly. "Won't you tell me the reason?" and as she spoke she came close to his side, laid one-of her dainty white hands upon his shoulder and took his hand with the other.

Reuten stool like a man in a trance. The girl he loved so dearly was by his side; his hand was clasped in hers; the warm perfame of the young girl's breath floated like hely incense about the young man's head. Reuben was in a delirium—the sweete tof all deliriums, love! He could not speak—his mind was in a maze. He was in a dream of happiness. He fit as if a single word would break the spell.

"Won't you tell me?" at an Mand pleadingly asked. The fall gray eyes, that were went to be so cold and pastimless, I should into the young man's face and shone with a soft latter that ne'er had shone there before.

"Oh, Mull" exclaimed the secretary, "I dare not tell you!"

"And why not?" whel Marel, with an arch glance of the gray eyes, now shining with a peculiar light. "Am I so terrible that Reuben Esmond, who has been my playmate—my teacher for many a long year—dares not tell me freely why he will as to leave my father's hour ??"

No, no, Murt? eried Reaben, vainly striving to stiffs in his limit the wild wish to take the fair firl in his arms, tell her that he loved her, and then ablde the cont quarces.

"Faith, Reaben!" exclaimed Macd, "The lite thy little force of if then does not tell me!" And with a smile she carried the young man's hand to her lips.

"Hear the truth then, Mand, since you will have it!" call thaten, his passion rights beyond all control. "I love you, Blaud-love you dearly?"

Mand did not start at the confession. For a moment she looked into her lover's face after he had made the confession of his love.

"You love me, and yet you wish to leave me?" she sail, with a smile and a blush that told Reuben Esmond that he had won the love of Mand Godalmin.

With an exclamation of joy, Reuben kissed the willing lips of the fair girl as for a moment he held her to his heart.

Had the good people of Plymouth looked upon the seene they would at once have come to the conclusion that March the statue," (as the Plymouth lads had named her, in compliment to her beauty,) had become very much like Mand the woman.

Gently Maud withdrew from her lover's arms.

"You will not go?" she asked, with a bright smile, gazing with eyes fall of love into the manly face of her lover.

" No, not if you wish me to stay," he answered.

"Can there be a doubt of that?" she asked, half repro-chfully. "If you had not said that you were going away I should not have known that I loved you."

"But, Mand, it will be misery for me to see this hangley lord paying empty compliments to you, while I am compliments to stand by—to listen and yet say nothing," sail Reulen, carnestly. "I hate him?"

"Let me tell you a secret, Reuben!" excl. imed Mand. "I dislike him, too."

"And do you prefer my love—the love of the hum'de some tary, to that of the wealthy and powerful Lord Fitzure !!!"

"Yes, Reuben—a thousand times, yes!" exclaim ! M. ..., impulsively.

"Mand, you make me the happiest m in in all New Earland," sail the secretary, gazing fondly into those loving gray eyes. "But, Mand, now that I know I love you and that you have me, I have a double reason for leaving your taker's in me, and service to seek my fortune. As your father's secretary, I for sure that he will never consent to my wedding the ; I do in the struggle for fature I may win a name that he will not blush to see coupled with his own."

"What do you propose to do, Rouben?" the mailer wie!

"Become a soldier," the secretary replied. "The Chay is ever at war with some of the Indian tribes, and fighting-men are in demand. Thanks to my friend, Enoch Andrews, the Plymouth scout, there are few better shots with the rifle in all New England than I; and I have also some little knowledge of weoderaft. Captain Church is as lowly born and once was. as poor as I, yet now he ranks as the first soldier in the colony. He has risen—why may not I?"

"But, if you should fall by the hands of these cruel redmen in the wilderness?" asked Maud, as with terror in her face, she thought of the danger that her lover would encounter should he carry out his resolve.

"Then mourn me as one who has fallen in a glorious cause, for what can be more glorious than to die for one's country and for the girl one loves?" cried Reuben, impetuously.

"Oh, Resiben!" she murmured, "be careful for my sake."

"Man I, better die in the attempt to win you, than live and see thee lost to me because of my poverty," exclaimed Reuben.

"You will succeed, I am sure you will," she said, looking into the secretary's face with the gray eyes so full of love.

"With you for the prize, and love to spur me on, I can not fail. Let me once win a name that your father will not be teshamed of, then I can openly claim you before all the world."

"And I will wait faithfully and patiently until you do claim me," said Maud.

"I sirall see your father at once, and inform him of my decision to leave his service."

"But then, after you leave the mansion, I shall not be able to see you, even though you remain in Plymouth; for of course should you visit the house my father will suspect our secret," s ...! Maud, in dismay.

"Do you not walk sometimes on the crest of yonder hill?" And Readen pointed to the eminence whereon was the gravevard, that we have before spoken of.

A smile passed over Mari's face at her lover's question. She understood well his meaning.

" Yes," she replied, "I do-it is my favorite walk."

" It I should happen to meet you there on Thursday, after the mean med, there would be no harm, and possibly, by that ti ..., I can tel! you all my plans for the future," said Reuben, an answering smile appearing on his face as he suggested the arrointment.

"I will come," she said.

Once again the secretary held the blushing girl in his arms—once again he touched the fresh, red lips. Perhaps it was the last embrace—the last kins that he should ever receive frem Maud Godalmin. Then the Lyons returned to the house.

CHAPTER VI.

AGAWAM, THE MOHEGAN.

On the morning following the one which had brought the new Governor into Plymouth Larbor, Enoch Andrews, the secut, stood again within the little grave-yard on the creet of the hill overlooking the town. He was waiting to the opportunity of the Indian, Namattah. Enoch had determined to see the brave before proceeding on his mission to the works of Poeasset to invite the dreaded Metamora to the council of the colonists.

"What can have induced this Molecum to I ave his till a and become a Wampanoag?" muttered the screet, ea, with his eyes fixed upon the dense forest before him, that he mand his the view inland, he watched for the red brave. "To give up his name and take another, I can't understand it."

The scout did not have much time to probler over the matter, for he had scarcely been ten minutes a state on the provestance, when the tall form of the Indian emerged from the sholow of the woods and came directly to him.

- "My red brother has kept his word," said the see to
- plied the Indian.
- of Poeasset?" asked Andrews.
- "Let my trother then his ers and litten; le will her many things," responded the Indian. "The great chick of the Nipmucks—the Sucos—the Taranteens—the Pepuls and the Narragansets last night in the council-bolgs small the calumet of peace with the Wanganergs, and actual the war-path against the pale-faces."

"Will my brother the me to the lodge of the chief of the

W. Fall and the sound.

he dail see the Ferest King," convered the Ralian.

"The cliefs of the colony are about to hold a council, and they wish the Wamp mong chief to come. They think that they can make a treaty with Metamora and prevent this ture tend war."

"The Wampinear chief will come, but all the wampum is N w Eagled will not find him to peace. The reliched will have it, though it contains him his own. The beby son of Metamora went to the spirit-land he third; his had was childed to death by the while chiefs of the Digitalt Lake, who upset the canon of the appear want child of the Per t Hing on the pron water,"

The large of the scatt grow dalt as he braid the Indian the Helf the death of M. tomords son. Andrews knew the Indian Character too well to doubt that the savage father would be an indian that the savage father would Lave his by ver come for the death of his bale.

"This is bed news, Arrawan," sail the scout, s'only.

now!' said the Indian.

"My bether hater Metamora?" qualined the weekmen.

"The Ferent King shall sing his death ong when the arm cities him!" one i the Leban, poully.

the state of the property of the second of t verified by the first the first the constitution of the first the

" Gren, Chief; Illien," replied America

"May me as no At in ma, a Mohann chief, I for the I all of his fathers by the swift-flowing river—the Corrections—in I jumped to the right sum. He came to the Big Salt Lake in the land of the Pawtuckets. He saw in the forest a squaw. She was as leautiful as a singlety bird, and as gentle Among the Mohegan squaws are many singing-birds who would have been glad to come and sing in the wigwam of the chief; but not one of the Mohegan squaws could not in with the dove that the chief saw in the woods by Mount Hope many moons ago."

"Mount Hope!" cried the astonished secut. "Why, that is the home of Metamora!"

"My brother speaks true," replied the Indian. "From a Pawtucket brave the Mohegan chief learned that the dove-squaw was a Wampanoag. For love of the Wampanoag squaw the Mohegan became a Wampanoag—Agawam became Namattah. He gave up his country, his nation, and his kin, to dwell in the land of strangers."

"Did my brother win the singing-bird for whose sake he became a Wampanoag?"

- "No," answered the Indian, sadly. "When the Mohegan gave up all for the sake of the Wampanoug squaw, he did not know that she was the wife of another."
- "Ah!" exclaimed Andrews, guessing at the truth. "Tile
 - " Nameokee !"
 - "The wife of Metamora!"
 - "Yes," laconically answered the chief.
- "And the Mohagan chief loves the wife of the Ferest King?"
- "As the sun loves the earth!" exclaimed the chief, extend-

"And that is the reason why my brother hates the Wampanoag chief!' exclaimed the scout.

"Yes," said the Indian, siercely, while his dark eyes firshed fire. "The knife of the adopted son of the Wampan are shall drink the blood of the Forest King; his squaw shall come and sing in the wigwam of Namattah."

"And that is the reason why you betray the designs of King Philip upon the whites?"

"My brother speaks straight," answered the Indian; "the chief of the Wampanoags shall die, but it shall be a red brave's hand that strikes the death-blow."

" Well, we won't quarrel as to that, chief," replied the sire Metamora's death so that you can possess yourself of Nuncokee, his squaw. I desire his death because he is the Litter enemy of my kin led, and the colony will never have peace while he lives. But now, chief, will you conduct mo to Metamora's wigwam, so that I may deliver to him the message of the elders of the colony?"

"Let my brother follow me," replied the Indian. "My white brother will not tell his brothers the story of the Mo-Legan?"

" Not a word, chief," said the scout.

"Come. Pocasset long way from here."

By the route that the Indian and scout journeyed it was a me thirty miles from Plymouth to the encampment of the Indian king. So that the sun was sinking in the western slies when the twain arrive Pat Poeacet. Namattah bore at ones the message to Metamora that one of the white chiefs from Plymouth colony desired to have speech with him.

The scout, who remained at the edge of the clearing, with his keen eyes noted many little things that convinced him that the Indians were in leed preparing to take the war-path.

"There's bloody times ahead," he mattered, as he looked upon the red warriors.

Enceh dil not have long to wait, for Nomattah soon returned, and bilding him follow, conducted him to the councillorge, wherein sat Metamora and the principal chiefs of the Warajanous.

Metamora cast a piercing glance upon the white messenger as he entered the lodge.

Andrews was instantly recognized by the red chiefs, for the fune of the Plymouth scout was great among the tawny war-riors of all New England.

The calamet of peace being duly smoked, Metamora arose.

The chiefs of the Wamp mongrare glad to see their white brather. The white chief is a great fighting-man—his heart is big—his arm strong. He comes to talk to the red-men—their ears are open—they will listen."

Then Metamora resumed his seat.

Andrews, used to the customs of the Indians, understood that he had received his cue to deliver his message. So he rose to his feet and addressed the warriors:

"I come to the chiefs of the Wampanongs from their white brothers by the Great Salt Lake. The white chief in two sleeps will hold a council. They have heard that their red brothers have sell red wrong at the hands of some of the white braves. They would have what there wrongs or, and redires them. The hearts of the white chiefs are fall of I we to their red brothers. They would have justice done them. If the red-mon have been wronged by them tell of it; their white brothers will right that wrong."

Then the scout, having finithed his speech, which he had delivered in the Indian fashion, sat down.

For a few moments there was silence in the council. The invitation had evidently taken the cair is by surprise. On the very eve of taking the war-path arribst the colony, lo! and they were invited to a council to talk of peace.

The In their swere not dedeient in shrew in .s. They was fully aware that, if they declined the invitation of the whites, it would be looked upon as presseing war, and that would defeat their plan of striking a sullen and deally blow up a the colonia. Motumera especially saw that the invitation could not be evided; the difficulty must be met promptly. He therefore rose again to speak:

"The leaves of the Wang mones have heard the work of the white chief," said the Indian. "They thank their white hadhers by the Big Sait Loke. The Wanger as will said one of their chief to the cornell of the pulsa."

Then the Indian again resumed his seat.

Authorises with the man better the chief in process of "The what bear reject the chief of the William to your they call him King Philip becomes he is a minute you. It is with King Philip that they would take. Will the common to the common? The red-mentalish have justice it in y will tell their wrongs."

Again the small sat down.

Metamora sprung to his feet.

"Let my brother of the long rifle go back to his pupile; let him tell the white chiefs that Metamora will come to the ave suffered. The ped chief has said—he will come! Let the long rifle rest to-night in the wigwam of the red-men, and to-marrow carry Metamora's answer to his people."

And so the council ended. :

CHAPTER VII.

A LORD'S WOODNO.

The morning arrived on which the council of the whites, to which Metamora had been invited, was to be held. Enoch Audrews had duly returned and reported the promise of the great Wampanoug chief to attend the council.

During the time that had intervened between the day of his arrival and the morning set for the council, Lord Fitzamold had had desperate siege to the heart of Mand Godalmin—nable to her distress, for how fally she disliked the countly lord, her conversation with Reuben Esmend plainly revealed.

But the gay courtier did not seem to realize that his attentions were displicating to the New-Backink maken. He was ever by her side—ever ready to do her service with pleasant unit and courtly compliment upon his lip.

Man't grow to dislike him more and more. She tried to clow by her stable I coolness that she was annoyed by his persistent admiration and endless attentions.

Gill at Fizarnold, however, had had too many love-pastor a to be easily discommed. He mistook the young onl's color a for maldenly molesty. He did not think it possible that a maiden reared in the New-England wilderness could resist the attractions of a gallant from thom Charles' bridlent court:

After the merning med Mand had retired to the solivale of her chander, greatly to Fitzara ld's disappointment. He had calculated on holding sweet converse with her till the council should call him from the soft dalliance of love to the stern duties of war. But he resolved not to be cheated out of his interview. During his short sejourn in Sir Gey's mansion he had noticed that the little apartment wherein Godalmin kept his scanty store of books, and which was dignified by the title of "the library," was Maud's favorite resort. So, siter the morning meal was over, finding that the girl had hut herself up in the seclusion of her room, Pitzarnold took jossession of the library.

Ensconcing himself in a huge easy-chair and placing it with its back to the door, so that he was completely concealed from eight unless one was fairly within the room, Lord Gilbert waited.

"I don't exactly know why this girl has made such an impression upon me," he mused; "possibly, 'tis because she is so unlike all the women that I have previously fincial. There is a freshness—an innocence about her that is charming. Now I can understand why Charles forsakes the langity Frenchwoman, the Duchess of Portmouth, and turns to bittle Nell Gwynne, the orange-girl, for consolation. The freshness and simplicity of this fair New-England flower is so thing to my nature after the whirl and extravagance of court life. By Heaven, I'll win and wear her?" And Lord Gilbert translatic bis clenched hand down heavily upon his knee as he spake, as if to give weight and force to the muttered resolve. "She that opportunity."

Then the door of the library opened suddenly, and Maulentered. Lord Gilbert rose from his chair, much to Maul's astonishment and chagrin. She had not anticipated his presence there. But it was too late to retreat. She felt that she was fairly entrapped into an interview with the man she now actually detested. With a low courtesy she acknowledged the elaborate bow of the lord.

"By my faith, hely, your presence is as welcome in this dull room as the soft rain to the spring flowers!" he exclaimed.

"Again at your compliments, my lead!" respected

"No, no, lady!" he replied, gall intly; "I speak the truth. I was wondering but now how I should pass the dall hours away till the business of the council should summon me; and to! like an angel of light you have come to drive away my

"I come but to get a book," she said. "I should not have decomed of introlleg had I known that your lordship was her. I will retire and not disturb your lordship."

Ment became very uneasy under the bold glances of admirei mit that Paranold was so freely be stowing upon her.

"Relie? By the crown of our kine, no!" exclaimed the Ir', battly. "It is not often that I have the pleasure of so it rank convening with you alone, and I would not give up this opportunity for worlds. Pray be scated."

And Fitzain ald offered the large casy-chair to the unwilling 51.1.

Willing or unwilling, Mand felt that she must submit to the disagreeable tesk of listening for a half-hour to the man, or old epenly affront her father's guest. So she accepted the proffered seat.

Index lead when I sailed from England for this colony, I had little item what fortune had in store for me in the New World. I had a dreamed that, on the rock-bound shore of Plymouth, I should find a jewel that none of the gems of the Old World I left behind can compare withal."

"You jut, my lord," sail Mart, follow, painfully embur-

I . w l, for she pares of the Coming declaration.

"Man!, have you not seen the truth in my glances!" he can it. "I have you, Mand—love you as I he'er have love! I have I have that I loved other women, but never had I fit a part in so hap, so into ne, as the one that now I have heart." Fazarn it's tone showed plainly that he was in in earnest.

I'm II. in a in a terrible plicht. She but endervored in the total of heration. If ran in that she could not be in a state of the policy of the policy of the policy.

"My lit," she sail, "I will you had not specken as you have, for I-I can not return your love."

Help them belon the Gilbert Fazarnold, it would not be a reported had never occurred that his love might be rejected had never occurred that. Like the Sultan in the entern tale, he thought he had not be the right he in that to throw his han ikerchief and choose who re he listed.

"How?" he cried; "is it possible that I understand you rightly, Mand? You reject my love?"

"I can not do otherwise," she replied.

"You can not?" questioned Fitzarnold. "What do you mean?"

Man I saw that her secret was in danger.

"I do not wish to reply," she sail, rising in confusion.

"Step, Mand!" cried Fitzarnold, springing to his feet. "Yea owe me an explanation. If you reject my love it is but right that you should tell me why you reject it."

" My lord, I-" and Maud hesitated.

"You do not speak!" exclaimed Fitzarnold. "You Lave said that you can not accept my love; now tell me why."

"You have no right to ask that question!" cried Man!, the color flushing up into her checks.

"I claim that right!" replied Fitzarnold, an ominous leck in his fierce dark eyes...

"Since you force me to an wer, do not I have me if I speak the truth, or if that truth wounds you," exclaimed Mart, in desperation. "I do not love you, and I feel that I can never love you."

"Ah--indeed!" said Fitzarneld, while dark, ugly lines appears habout his mouth and eyes. "It that the only recently and a perfect book was in his dark eyes as he asked the question.

"Is not that by the cacush?" a kel Mart, now thereasily angry at Fitzarnold's questioning.

Fitzernold, steady. "I am not a boy, but a man well veril in the ways of the world—a man not easily decived. You father, Sir Gay, is favorable to my out. He is willing—had, anxious, to receive me as a consinctive. He tall model to to anxious, to receive me as a consinctive. He tall model to to to make you were hour free, and gave not for product a to woo can't win you. Your father has been decived, Man he Yes are not hear free; you have a lever. Oh, I have a hear ey for realing faces, and I read the truth in yours a man as any, when I offered you my love. Now, faten to me, Man of course I can not gat a who this lover is, that you is you love—for you are not yet old enough to know your exempinal fully; but, I am satisfied that he is below you. I have till y ur feller of this circury, and he will take measures to crush this foolish passion in the bud."

"You have no right to speak them to me, Lord Fitzerhold?"

cited March, in service. The young pirk, fair and gentle as shown, in the pirit of her own. "And since you know so much, be mostelly a cheething that you do not seem to have mice est, and that in I despise you, Lord Fitzerhold, and I would rather distance as your whele. And now, Lord Fitzerhold, please year as and from the decreasy and let me pass. I trust that years?"

Will of a word, Fitz and I stepped from the doorway and allowed Maud to leave the room.

"S. shall be mine?" cried Fitzarnold, as she disappeared in the Stairway. "By all the finals below, I swear that I will not resign her. I'll find means to bend Sir Gay to my will."

CHAPTER VIII.

AN INDIAN'S SCORN.

In the little little characterists eved as a town ball for Plymode, we construct the colors of the colony, Sie Gay Gotain, Lord Call of Fire apold, and the malatary arm of the colony, represented by Captain Characa and his soldiers. The company Descie Andrews, was also present, leading on his long with

The first of the cliers were grave in lead. They had ally fir and learned to respect the prowest of the Wampanoag chief, who was by far the most terrible the that had over assailed the colonists.

"This ye, Sir Gy, that Matanan will ome?" Pitzarnold asked.

"What course of action do you tillak it hast to purste. Sir Guy ?" asked Ditzmaold.

"Make a truly of pace with him if possible," as swered Sir Gay. "Do you not think, worthy him is, that that will be the best plan?" he continued, addressing the elders.

" Much the best," said one, speaking for all, while the others gravely nodded assent.

The colonists understood too well the hearons of an Indian war to enter upon one if it could be avoided.

"But, why should we paties with these reptiles?" demanded Lord Fitzurneld, haughtily. "Are we not strong en mylto muster our forces and exterminate them?"

The elders shock their leads in alarm at the solding summary method of dealing with the rel-skins.

"Ah, my lord," sait Sir Gay, "you are as yet a stranger in the colony. You do not understand the halfts of the savages. We might, as you say, exterminate than, but not without much trouble and bloodshot. This Metamora care before carried the knife and brand all along our berders, and had we not been assisted by the friendly tribes of Mohaces and Mohawks, it would have fared hard with us. An Indian war is an evil which it is better to avoid if possible. He distinct must be our last resource."

"Doubtless you are right, Sir Gay. How do you intend to proceed with this chief when he comes?" a kell Fazzan ili, who saw plainly that the sentiment of the council was against war.

"I shall charge him with preparing for the war-path as do the colony, despite the treaty of peace he has made with the Allo, with an inavoring to form the neighboring till a into a confederacy ho tile to the whites," and Sir Guy.

"The plan is gol," of ervel Fazare di, the witterly.
"But, if this chi f has really an intention of talker as are spiral to a galast us, and is as skillad we be made passible in our power."

"What think you, Contan Cauch-you have held inc experience—will the chief come?" ask d Elr Gry.

"If he has given his word to attend the council," mil the sollier, "I'll wager my rapier against a crown-piece that he will come."

"And what tainkest then, Esoch Andrews—thou knewstill i direct those religibles—will the chief of the Wenter of the Wenter geome?" asked Sir Guy.

"He gave my bis word to attend the council, and if he scout.

mora will come."

to sign a treaty of peace?"

"He is to alle a leafer for these savages, to be at large and a leafer through the Church, if I give you the signal, producte your elf upon this chief, and kill rether that — Is a there in I be lestins armed and in the field against us."

So Gry he i har lly finished speaking when a form darkened to open decrease, and the next instant Metamera, the Wanter of chief—the Ferest King, strode into the council-ci, and or.

His always entrance surprised the council. All gazed in we will ratte myly-decked form of the muscular chicfmin, and for a few moments there was silence.

Motenment swept his glittering eyes, that shene with herilitic like coals of fire, around upon the astonished pale-

"Ye ive sont for me, at I I've come!" said the savege, in the deep which so terrilly, in days gone by, had rong extilly a realizable paper the casef the colonists, when he had into a their parise which is 1 lors before him in the deeper of the again.

It is A to ment the savege waited for a repay. Then he spoke again.

"II I I've nothing to talk about -- nothing to do, I'd go back again."

Sie Gew (i inhain at last found his voice.

Live a really called your own warriers together for the perperson of warriers together for the perculture related join the other tribes into a confederacy with you to rush in upon their white brethren-shughter then-barutheir dwellings,"

These words betrayed to the chief that his secret plan for overthrowing the power of the pale-faces had in some way become known to them, yet the muccles of his iron-like faces never quivered.

"Ugh! the Wampanong does not wish to harm his white brethren," sail the savage, evasively, "but if the flist lestricken hard it will show that its heart is fire." The voice of the Indian king swelled out loudly upon the ears of the council, as he made the covert accusation.

"I understand what you mean. You allude to some wrong or oppression that the red-men camplain of, and of which, possibly, the whites are not guilty," said hir Guy.

"Not guilty?" cried Metamora, in scorn, while the glance of fire he cast around caused many an obler's face to whiten and his knees to shake, though the red chief was alone and in the midst of Plymouth town. "Not guilty?" repeated the Forest King, in double scorn. "Their take tangues have happed up the blood of my heart. The harm's dove of the Wampanoag king was plunged beneath the dark waters of the Big Salt Lake—the cold stream chilled his little heart. His shale flutters around my heart, and with a big voice calls on the tribe of his fathers to give it blood for blood?"

Like the knell of doom rung the voice of the Ferest Ring upon the ears of the white council. The chlors nerversly glanced into the air above the head of the red chief as if expecting to see there the spirit of the murdered child. Their hearts were childed, though the words of the Wamp noon were words of fire.

Met ancia paused but for a moment in his speech.

"Have they not done this?" he demanded, ringing out the question with all the thunder of his deprecie. "And pet 'you say they are not quilty!" Withcring was the tore of seem with which the untubred redenon—the son of the wildernes, pronounced the simple words.

Sir Gry had been informed by the scout, Enoch, of the cowardly outrage that had been committed upon the wire and child of the Watapanoug chief, and he knew it would be u class to deny the agency of the whites in the matter.

"Metamora," he said, slowly, "your as ertion is too true. But no one more deeply regrets the outrage than myself. I shall take every measure to discover and punish the offen lers. But the whole body of the white men should not be held resonable for the acts purp trated by a few lawless individuals." But Sir Gry might as well have talked with the howling winds that I shall threath the Plymouth pines, or tossed the white case of the breakers that dashed upon the Plymouth rocks, as to try to 6 higher the chief of the Wampaneags that the white men were not hostile to the Indians:

"The shalls of my murdered kindred rise in the morning mid and sing the death-song of my tribe in my ear," exclaimed the red chief, solumnly. "The angry spirits of my fathers cry war from the wirel-cloud, and ten thousand warriors answer it in the war-dance. From hill to hill and from vale to vale the smale of many watch-fire rolls up in a war-cloud that will hile the san's face, and bur t upon you in arrows of fire. The pull-lace has da held down the red-man's pipe of peace, and is asked are stattered to the many winds!" Lond and the chief was the voice of the Forest King.

The first of the oblers showed their fear as they listened to the lid with of the Wang many chief. The face of Fitz-thank it, he were, was not with parties. The English lend will life he knowledge of the savage.

"The Wataparengs are subminary wroteles, who think for the limit of the Eaglish!" cried Fitzernold, in a race. "The value is a large never wronged them, but have always felt and multiple is a kindly feeling toward them; and though we do be uptiling but peace, yet, if war alone can extisfy the Wataparengs, we are brave enough and well enough prepared to give them blow for blow?"

In the late of the

A ment shift passed over the Wampinont's face as ho He in I to the words of Figurneld. Centemptuous was his g'the as he some I the Englishman from Lead to fact.

of the Indian for the threatening words that he had heard;

"the white man talks big-Metamora knows not fear!" And the Indian drew his stately form to its utmost hight.

"The relichief has stood upon the king of hills when the gray mists were at his feet, and the Great Spirit passed by him in his writh. The rocks crembbel at the flash of Maniton's eye. Then he felt proud and laughed. Metamora tears no men, and will not turn upon his heel to save his life."

Provel was the glance of deflance that the red king cast upon the council.

"Metamora has heard the pale-face chiefs talk—he has talked to them, but Metamora talks to them no more. He will return to his wigwam, and let the white hunter heware of the panther." Then the chief turned upon his heel to depart.

"Stay, chief!" cried Sir Gay, "we are not done."

Metamora turned again, and faced the whites.

" Speak-the red-man listens," said the Indian, terrely.

"Metamora, what say you to our charge that you have tried to excite the neighboring tribes to go upon the war-path against their white brothers?" asked Sir Guy.

"Who says that Metamora has done this?" replied the Indian, evading the question.

"An Indian of your own tribe."

"One of my own tribe—a Wampane g?" asked the chief, in scorn.

" Yes."

"And will the pule-faces listen to the words of a traiter?" demanded the chief. "The dog of a Wampanour that latrays his king has the heart of a pule-face—his soul is two small for an In line. Bring him before me—let Metamera le he in his eye, and like an eagle he will scare him to death with his giance?"

"This vi lence, Metamora, is no answer to the charge," said Godalmin, sternly.

The charles the brow of the savege-the flerce chares of his eye, all-gave warning of the coming storm. Sand it burst.

"White hearted sagamores!" cried the Wampaness chief, while his face was convulsed with possion, "your hands have thrown the first tomal awk of war at the red-man! Your rebs smell of the blood of my tribe! You bear justice on your bear justice in your bear justice on your bear justice in your bear justice in the justice of his wer la.

Tivellers cover I at the ficree torrent of angry worls harling at them by the emaged Indian. They know full well

When a publice proves a snake unto his tribe, you publish him—you kill him. When a red-man proves a snake unto his tribe, we punish him—we kill him, too. But the price shart and kill the chiefs that do our bidding! They kill all but the snake that betrays the red-man; and still they talk of judice; but all their justice talk is a lie to the Indian."

Sir G my saw pinicity that there was little hope of peace. The Hard of the Porest King was up. Shoughter and earmed the new all appears the angry spirit raging in the heart of the Indian.

Gibbain realized to make one last attempt to satisfy the artry savage.

"It Maken ra will distand his warriors and retire with then, to only the limits claimed by the settlers, the whites shall be day published for all augressions upon the land of the red-men."

And a mill not the creedy soul of the white man grasp

. "N.," replicable Guy; " on such condition, Metamera may tely up a the figh of his white brethren."

the first of the white man is like the spear made of the man and it snaps in twain," restrict the Indian, writing. "The Wampanong will not trust the white man more."

"Ipseignt savage?" cried Patzarnold, leaping to his feet,

" il a but the power of the colony: sein him."

Two of the fell is the withenselves upon the Indian, who reds I not but I t them grasphis arms. But the veins swolling till position on the fire-chief the chief, and the glare of his taker, dark eyes, told that he was far from being sub-chief.

to the like the rearing externet that deshes the uprooted you from your dreams at night, and the red tomahawks shall glure in the blaze of your burning dwellings! Trember From the East to the West, in the North and in the South shall be heard the loud cry of vengeance, till the land you have stolen from us grown under your feet no more!"

Then, with a mighty chort, the Indian deshed the two sil swiftly toward the forest.

"Fire upon him!" cried Fitzarnold.

The soldiers delivered a scattering volley upon the flying Indian, but he gained the wood unhurt, and with a wholp of triumph, disappeared amid the trees.

CHAPTER IX.

A SECOND DISAPPOINTMENT.

"He has escaped, by Heaven!" cried Fitzainold, angily, as he beheld the Wampanoag chief gain the shelter of the wood.

"Nothing now can save us from a bloody war," said Sir

Guy, in gloom.

"Let us muster our fighting men and strike these savares at once, before they can attack us!" exclaimed the English lord.

"Your plan is good, my lord," Sir Guy observed, thoughtfully. "It we can surprise Metamora and his Wampen age, and crush them before they are joined by any of the neighboring tribes, it will be eve as a warning to the rest, and perhaps save us from a lang and Honly war."

Then Sir Guy turned to Andrews, who had remained haning on his ritle during the whole of the connect, and had not stirred finger to prevent the escape of the Indian. Truth to say, the short despised tree hery, and the attempt to share the chief when he had come trusting to the worl of the whites, did not scoon well with the weednan's ideas of fair-dealing.

"Friend Booch, I understand that thou art forming a company of Indian fighters from among the youths of the colony used to wooderaft. How many hast thou enlisted?"

"S me twenty, Sir Guy," responded the scout.

We can muster, then, over a hundred men. We had best attack time savages at once. Triend Andrews, canst thou had the troops of the colony to the abode of this savage, Metamora?"

"Yes, Sir Guy," answered the scout. "The Wampaneags are in the weeds of Pocasset."

"We will move against them this evening. The blow must be saiden and deally." Then Sir Guy addressed the elect. "Conthener, let us prepare at once. See that the volunteers are called forth. Captain Church, you will attend to the details."

"Yes; and I myself will head the expedition," said Fitz-

Cartin Charch and the scout exchanged glances at the walks of the English lord. The two Indian-fighters had little fall in Pitz roof its ability to handle the soldiers of the colony in an Indian contact. The broad plains of England were willly different from the for t-jun Ts of the New World.

At it so the convicil broke up, and the note and bustle of preparation for the consing fight rang through Plymouth town.

It was arranged that the colonial forces were to move at high in. A tan hours' murch would bring them to the woods of Product, so that the attack could be made early in the ratio.

mansion of the latter.

in and the least of the first favorable opportunity to and Sa Gay for the Land of Mand.

After the norm meal was over, Pitzernold and Sir Guy little chairs out on the little pinzes at the back of the little rank which, in the English feshion, grew clambering vices, filling the air with sweet perfume.

y u, y a lecture aware that I have taken a deep interest in your diaght r, Magal."

"Yes, my lord," replied the flattered father; "to say the truth, I was glad you were pleased with my girl."

"Nay, more than pleased," said the lord; "I love her. I know that my sojourn here with you in Plymouth har I en but a few brief days, but in that time—short as it is—I have learned to love your daughter."

"My lord, I can not but feel honored by your preference," responded Sir Guy, who really felt great delight at the prospect of a union between his daughter and the English lord—the Governor of Plymouth colony.

"Sir Guy, you told me but a day or so ago that your daughter was heart-free."

"I told you truth, my lord," replied the father, wandering

"You have been deceived, Sir Gny," said Fitzarn ald.

"With whom?" demanded Sir.Guy, in astonishmen

"Ah, that I know not; but I fear that the object of her passion is unworthy of her."

"But are you sure that you are not deceived?" taked Sir Guy, not willing to believe that he had heard the truth.

"I have little doubt on the subject," returned Firzum !!.
"This morn I told your daughter frankly that I loved her and asked her to accept my suit."

"And she?" questioned the father, anxiously.

" Refused."

" Refused you!"

And Godalmin's countenance looked blank at the intelligence.

"Yes, refused me," repeated Fitzarnold; "and from what she said, I am sure that the reason of that refusal is because she fancies that she loves another."

"I can not under and it," said Sir Guy, amazal.

"Has she not a lover among the youths of the colony?"

"Not to my knowledge," replied Goldmin. "Tis true that many of the young men of our town have sought to woo her, but she has said nay to them all."

"Then it is some secret lover, probably—as I gue !-- some one that is u. orthy of her."

"I will learn who it is!" cried Godalmin, quickly. "And yet I em har lightly be that my girl would describe unc-she

"Ay, but in a case like this a mailen charges," said Fitzet. II. "Have I yet your permission, Sir Gay, to woo and war year daughter, Man I?"

"A = really, my for !!" quickly replied Sir Guy.

"You know my rank is high, my fortune ample, and in the fivor of the king I stand almost without a per. I love your daughter, and with your consent will make her my wife."

"I will do all in my power to aid your suit, my lord," replied Sir Guy.

"It rats with you alone to complete my happiness."

"I do not understand how that can be, my Lord Fitzar-nold," said the father.

"It is shaple except," returned the other. "Question y ar daught r—learn from her own lips who this secret lover is; then order her to forget him and to prepare herself to receive me as her future husband."

"Dut suppose that she is really in love with this other that "In layed" and Fitzarnold's lip emied scornfully. "At the last it can be but a girll-h flary. Conrive to prevent increase the part lover, and she will soon forget him."

G-labrain shock his head in doubt.

"Be not to some of that, my lond," he replied. "Mand's not', r hept her flith with me in spite of kin and frients. The spirit of the nother may five in the daughter, to say nother of my own, which is of stub' in metal and one not easily the lift in his property."

"The event poor actively. Commonly her to forget this

'Brayfulh, m. lert, I cold a I can unwilling to a ret' lills with Thea, to, it she have a nother she will make to a sarry wife for the parented I for the termion."

"That risk be miss?" Caclaimed Programbly, quickly. "I do not fair, but that one will wife, I can win her love or lead her to find the " in the same in a program in a program signification is and out that the first and alternated ure than to see you the husband of my Mand; but to force her inclination, I own; I am unwilling."

"You refuse me then?" said Phzumold, and the stern glunces of his eyes showed how much he was angered by the refusal.

"Do not give it so harsh a term, my lord, I pray you," cried Sir Gay, quickly. "In all that I can do to save you, command me, save in this one thing. With my daughter's carsent, freely would I give her to you."

"Enough-I must bear my cross, since it e'en must be so," said Lord Gilbert, moodily.

"I will see my girl at one and question her?" enclained Sir Gay, troubled beyond measure at the news of his daughter's refusal of Lord Fitz rooks's hand, for he had a very urgery reason for wishing to make that gentleman his son-in-law—a reason that was weighty with life or death to Sir Gay Goldhain—dishonor and disgrace were in it.

"Do so," said Pitzarnoll; "you will see that I have spillen the truth—that is —if she answers truthfally."

"I do not doubt that, my lord," replied Sir Guy. "Please you to wait here, my lord; I will soon return." Then Gellamin harried away in search of Massel.

Left alone Pitzarnold gave an lible vent to his rage and dis-

"The dail-pate I fool?" he cried. "What should be care whether his daughter content or no, so he and I be willing? This girl has inspired me with a posion that sways my whole being! I would give much to win her—give much to be versified for the ray will, for she has scorned and dar I to tell me to my teeth that she hates me."

"How much will you give?" questioned a veloe, as a help from whence the veice came, appeared through the low ing vines at the side of the plazza. The veice and head beth were strange to Lend Gilbert Patzanold.

CHAPTER X.

THE SECRET OF GODALMIN.

' So, fillow, you have been listening?" exclaimed Fitzurn ... angrily.

"Yes, your lordship," returned the stranger, stepping over the riling of the plazza, and displaying a thin form ched in a slate-end red garb. The face of the envesdropper was as in a rashis figure. Cumning showed itself in the little, sharp eyes, and in the thin, bloodless lips, that were tightly com-

"Who are you?" asked Lord Gilbert, haughtily.

"Jab z Sa el, s'eward to Sir Guy Godalmin," answered the stranger, with a profound bow.

"Y u leve overboard my conversation with Sir Guy?"

"Every we. I," said the steward, with a cunning smile upon his thin where "I was sitting beneath the vines yonder, when you have Guy came upon the piazza. I could not will have vide at disturbing you, so, parince, I listened."

"T. a y in her year

- "That you be iship seeds the hand of Mistress Maul," intere to I the standard, "yes. That she has refused you —yes. Also that Sir Chy will not enforce his daughter to receive you as her future husband."
- "Well sir; granting that you know all these things, why do you into his your pressure upon my privacy?" said Fitzania 11.
- "He and I have been been been been that you would give to he had been been blishes Man hunto your will."

"A. Find that entern the steward of Sir Guy God-the the time of the state of th

n.... the libs will be give," replied Jabez, humbly,

"Will, an ear show me that my speech can have author to be with you. I will answer that question," said Lord Gilbert.

"Listen, then, my lord," said Jakez. "With gunpawder and fire we produce an explosion; either apart are handles; but, unite them, the effect is tremendors."

"You speak in riellles!" cried Fitzernold, imputiontly.

"Have patience, my lord, and I will explain the riblic," replied the steward. "I am the fire, you the grap owder. I will tell you something in regard to Sir Gay Go blinin that will produce an explosion, and that explosion place the life of Sir Guy in your hands."

"His life!" cried the lord, in actonishment.

"His life," repeated Jabez, with a coming smile.

"Are you sure of what you say?"

"As sare as that I am a livin, man," replied the steward.

"Let me know what your backlip is willing to pay for my exerct, and if it he a fair price, I will tell you something that will place Sir Gay Goldmin completely in your power, and force him to do your will, whether help willing or use ill. "

"What do you demand for this secret?' asked Fitzer ''.

after a moment's thought.

said Jabez, humbly.

Guy to my will, and the one hundred plands are years!" exclaimed Pitzarnold, quickly. He was fully satisfied from the manner of the steward that he had indeed semething of importunce to communicate.

bowing lowly. "If your lordship remetal cis, on the a traction that you had all from the London, you said that what was put may put—that none in the colony should be tradded for their

as a dene in days gone by, save one."

" Yes, I did say so."

"And your further added that the crime of that one, the hing could neither forget nor pardon."

"Yes; such were my work," replied Fizumold; "Lat, what has this to do with Sir Gay Goldmin?"

"A moment yet, my lord, and then my meming will be clear unto year as the sun at mon," said John. "At the respection of my lord, I pondered upon it. There is but on come for which Charles II, would be ept to wish to lead the perpetrat r down, for report says that our good king cares but little for artices of state, but leaves them to his ministers."

"You are night."

"The fire, it the led into my mind that the man whom the hirs wished to punish—even though his officers would have to considers in the mission—was Major Whalley."

"Right!" exclaimed Fitzarnold. "Whalley is the man I Chairs to England the moment he is taken."

"My guess then was right," said Jab z, rutbing his hands to rein r, solidy, in great satisfaction. "My lord, you will play the two by paints—Sir Guy Goldmin shall do your will and their Mistress Mand shall be your wife."

" Dat, what has my search after Major Whalley to do with singly that Major Whalley, formerly of Cromwell's Ironsiles, and Sir Gay Golalmin, Governor of Plymouth colony, are and the sume," answered the steward, in triumph.

Sir Guy G Balmin? asked Fitzumoll.

"Are you sare?" cried the lord, in amazement,

"I'll swear it leftre any court in the lend?" cried Jabez, c.r. 19. "Years ago, I role—a trooper—in the ranks of the Ir. 19. Whalley was my majer. Years have gone ly—self y the lend has changed greatly from stern Majer While y, but, I recently him in cantly when first I came to Ply... the length of the relative with him. I kept my own corsel, and my tooped between my teeth. Sir Guy is high in a re-I am partial between my teeth. Sir Guy is high in a re-I am partial between my teeth. But little sin to have Poless of New Items of the real Charles I, to the ax. But now, we would have to be self the real Charles I, to the ax. But now, we would have the length of your will. I want to the length of the real length of your will. I want to the length of the real parts of the story I that I have the absolutely in less?"

"Yes, and yes wind have the mancy if you have spoken truth," replied Fizarnold.

number that goes it," said the steward. "I have sy her which that goes it is the steward. "I have sy her which the hall. Qualitation, my look, qualitation him?" And which the wall the steward spring over the allies of the places and disappeared smid the vines.

"I will question him!" cried Fitzarnell, while the footsteps of Sir Guy, came menter and nearer. "If this follow Los spoken the truth, Sir Guy Golahain is indeed within my power; and, despite her stubborn will, the pacty March had be mine. Sir Guy will not dure to refer to force his durable to he came mine, when he knows that I hold his like within my lands, and that, if I will, I can crush him. 'Tis not almost the dainty person of this New-England flower that I cruve, but I would pay back the scorn that she bestowed upon me, with double interest. And, though she bobbly says she hates me, yet one day—an Sir Guy be in her I M jor Whalley—and shall sue for my love."

Sir Gny's entrance upon the piazza interrupted Fitzarrell's musings.

"Does your daughter deny the truth?" sekel Fitzernell.

"I can not find her," replied Sir Guy: "She in a t wi hin the house. Probably she has gene to visit some of our neighbors."

"Or perhaps stolen forth to meet her lover."

"My lord, I think your guess is wrong in regard to my daughter," said the father. "I can not believe that my girl has a lover in secret."

"Time will show," replied the lert. "But hark ye, Sir Guy, thou knowest the errand on which I came hither was to assume the Governership of Plymouth colory?"

" Yes, my lord."

"Before Isaving England I was charged with a mission by King Charles; the purport of that mis in of course you know not."

"Jat So, my lead," sail Sir Gay, wendering at the vends.

"It was to discover one of his fitther's muddleter-one of the reliables who doesned Charles the First to the av."

Goldain, despite his than nerves, turned slightly polest the words.

"Tis sail," centiand Pitzernell, who meaked well the pall rot for Gay, "that this man, when the hier deduct to tring to the scalfold and the ax, has read deducted a large in New England. He is called Major Whalley."

Good during over a slight start as the mane fell upon his car.
"It is possible, my lord," he said, in a voice that treaded sightly, though he stroye hard to conceal sighs of emotion

"The territ ry of New England is large; many people dwell within its bord as. This man you speak of may have found ther here, and yet his mane never fell upon my car since I are dwelt in the New World."

"If the report that hash reached my ear be true, this Maje Whill y is not known by his true appellation, but has true an incharacter," said Fitzarnold. "Nay, more: 'tis even said that he had till a to high rank in the colony."

"I-I have not heard this report you speak of, my lord," said Godalmin, in great agitation.

"In he i! it's strange!" cried Fitzarnold, now fully certain, it is it is give her up. She must be mine!"

" Meximined Sir Guy, not liking the tone of com-manitimative von of the Englishman.

Manday, " and to a girll han ion that she can not listen to a not perfect that the can not listen

"How, my bad?" quest a 1 Sir Gay.

"Yet with established her to accept her as her husband!" rejied Lord Gilbert, coolly.

" My it is i, I have already told you that I can not do that," said Sir Guy.

Photo I say you will do it," responded Fizzernold, firmly, what the Laston sails for Enciced, she will bear in bridge, in carries, the relation, Major Whalley."

"My lead to you man? How can that concern that to he is lips at a land his check was white.

· P. . · that q - tien, M.j r Whalley?"

"What I am I Sir Guy started at the charge; "do you man to sey, my ball, that I am this man whom you have been sent to seize?"

While is the While of the Property of the first of the with the contract of the contract to be served under you in Early. That with a six prepared to swear to your ident.

You were one of the judges who condemned Charles the First to the ax. How long, think you, would it be after your arrival in England before your own neck would feel the leen edge of the steel to which you gave the haples Charles?"

"Oh, I am ruined!" moaned Sir Gay, in deadly pain.

"Then you confess the truth?"

"Yes, I am Major Whalley."

"I can save you from the king's vergeance if you will be guided by my advice. Mys if end one other know your secret. That other speaks or holds his pace, as I list. Give me thy daughter, and I swear not to betray you."

"But the king-how caust thou satisfy the king?"

"The king! ha! ha! ha!" and Fitzarnold laughed scornfally. "What cares royal Charles, so long as his pleasures full not, whether the murderers of his father are brought to justice or not? He did but send me on my mission for the name of it; and, lost in the licentious pleasures of his court, he has, ere this, forgotten it."

"Lord Fitzamold!" exclaimed Sir Guy, after a moment's thought, "if I accede to thy demand, and force my daughter Mand to become thy wife—whether she be willing or unwilling—wilt thou take a solemn oath never to reveal my secret?"

"By my name and knighthood, I swear it!" replied Fliz-arnold.

"Be it so, then," said the old man, slowly. "I will comman! Mand to become thy wife. She will not dare to disobey me."

" You will acquaint her with your will at once?"

"Yes, the moment she returns. Ah! my lord, it is a heavy blow to be discovered after all these years of fancied security," sail Sir Guy, slowly.

"Your secret will be safe," replied Fitzamold. "Once your daughter's husband, you may rest assured that I shall take care to grant my wife's father from all harm."

"I will seek Man i at once," said Godalmin; "it is better that she should know her fate than remain ignorant of it."

And so the twain entered the house.

CHAPTER XI.

A DISCOVERY AND A DEFIANCE.

In the little grave-yard on the crest of the hill overlooking

Plymouth town, stood Reuben E-mond and the Plymouth

Lut, Enoch Andrews.

The garb of the secretary had changed somewhat since lest we saw him. A hunting-shirt of decr-skin had replaced the sale of reliciouslet of the Puritan. The belt that girded his waist, held a break-bladed hunting-knife, and stout leather legans and In him moccasins replaced the woolen stockings and backle shies. A powder-horn hung at his side, and his hard grasped a long rifle.

Ranken Hemond was no longer the accretary to Sir Guy Calmin, but had joined the band of Indian-fighters, headed by the Plymouth scout.

To Andrews, his his night from boyhood, Reulen had confided the secret of his love for the Governor's daughter, Mand Godindi. And new, in the little grave-yard, he waited for Mand to keep her tryst.

The treeps were to much at six, and the twenty scouts, it is the Andrews, were to form the advance guard. So that this median would probably be the last one between the lovers for some time to come.

It is a little town," said Andrews; "you won't be likely to be discur-l, and I should only be in the way. Remote r, it's only about five hours before we march."

"I sind is with you within an hour," replied Reulen;
"An all the fall Mark will not take up much time. She will: there to remain absent long, let her fich renearet."

Way well; you'll find me at the town-house," and Lhoch an to descend the hill.

The state of the minutes when Much came the minutes when Much came to the public path. Restants from Ethted up with joy, which is the girl.

"My ran le 1 Me !! he che ', au she re ched his side, almost breathless with her run up the hill. "You have come. I feared that something might have detained you."

"No, I left the house without being observed by any one except our steward, Jabez. He little guessed, I trow, that I was going to meet you." And Mau I looked into her lover's face with a glad smile. Then her eyes fell upon his weapons and woodman's dress. "Why, Reaben!" she cried, "you are dressed like a scout."

"I am one now, dear Maud," he answered. "I have joined the Indian-fighters commanded by Enoch Andrews, the Plymouth scout. We march at nightfall to the battle with King Philip and his Wampanoags."

"You will be in danger, then! Reuben, if you should fall by the han is of these savage Indians!" and Maud shall red at the thought, and clung closer to the breast of her layer.

"But, if I can win a name in the fight, your father then may consent to our union," replied Rauben, hopefully.

"And do you not think that he will consent now, when I tell him how much we love each other?" asked the maiden.

"I fear not, Mand," said Reuben, doubtfully.

"He has always seemed to like thee!" cried Maud. "Oft have I heard him speak in thy praise."

"Ay, all you say may be true, and yet, should I ask him to give me you, his daughter, I am afraid that his anger would be great," replied Reuben. "Remember what I am: an explain, without family, fortune, or friends. But one man in all Plymouth who would willingly and freely do me saying and he is Enoch Andrews. Books, this wealthy and powerful lord, I am sure, seeks your love."

"Yes, he does." Then Mand told of her interview in the library with Lord Fitzarnoid.

"You see, Mand, I was right," Reuben said, after she had finished. "Your father will approve of the sait of this powerful lord, I am convinced."

"Not if I say may?" exclaimed Mark. "My father, stern as he may be to all the world, yet to me has ever been hir I and grade. When I tell him that I do not and can not have this handley Backet peer, I am certain he will not force by will. And when I tell him how dearly I love thee, I am sure he will not flown upon our affection." And with eyes full of trust as I love, Meas I looked into the tace of the man who had won her virgin heart. .

"No, no, dear Man!, do not decrive yourself!" Reuben evel in it "I am but a precrept in reared by your factor's it may to man's edite. My tille is my only fortune. Do not think, even for a single instant, that your father would can at to your union with one who possesses neither name or tank."

"What shall we do?" questioned the mailen, anxiously king into her lover's face.

"At present nothing," replied Rouben. "Let us await the insect this expedition. If your father insists upon your beaming the wife of this proud lord—as I am afraid he will—there is but one alternative for us."

" And that is?"

"You must fly with me," replied Renben —"fly with me, I ve, to same distant settlement, and there unite your fate with mine—there that that happiness denied us here."

"Dit, to have my fither who has always be a kind to me?"

Mand marmared, while a tear dimmed the bright eyes.

"By, if he play the tyrant, and would force you to wed wire you can never give your heart..."

"Then I will fly with you-I will become your wife!"

Man Leviliand.

"Do not one, that is all I ask?" Reulemerick. "This will probably to or last me time for a me time. King Philip will not be been easily. Lord Fitzurnell is to lead the colonial trans. He knows nothing of the manner and method of the iterations at the probable both rath and handhay. If he is a try little the later judiment of Captain Church as the colony, who have had experience that others the rather than the later that instead of beating the I'm the I the later that ever healed the redshins, in it will be not experience that it is the first that ever healed the redshins, in it will be not experience to be not redshins, in it will be not experience to be not redshins,

" I will in y michely a ryen that you may acture unhance!,"

... M. ... retire that it is the top of a character.

La and your interpretable to his breest.

"I must return now; my father may miss me. Farewell. I shall not forget you for a single instant till I am in your embrace again," and Mand held up her lips to receive the farewell kiss.

A long, lingering kiss, full of love--heart to heart and soul to soul-then Maud gently released herself from her lover's arms.

"Good-by!" The farewell word was spoken. Mand turned to go when, to her di may, round the turn in the little path, by the clump of bushes, came her father, Sir Guy Goddinin, and Lord Gilbert Fitzarnold.

A moment sooner and they would have discovered her locked in the arms of her lover. The hot blood flowled Mand's checks and temples as the thought flashed up an her mind. She felt that had the been discovered thus, she must have died with shame.

"Well, Sir Gay," said Fitzarnol!, "what do you think now? Was not my guess a good one?"

Sir Gay's brow was stern as he advanced.

" Man i, what do you here on the hill?" he asked, sternly.

"Father, I--" Mand's eyes sought the ground beneath her father's angry glance.

"Can you not see?" said Fitzarnold, with a sneer. "She came to meet youder gentleman. By Heaven! I know that face!" Fitzarnold cried, as he recognized the young man. "It is your secretary, Sir Guy, though, from his dress and name, it would seem that he has left the peaceful pursuits of literature to take up the weapons of war—turned his quid into a ride, and his inh-stand into a powder-horn."

"Reuben, this is not well to steal the love of the develoter of your benefictor," said Godalmin, and rily; "and you, digenerate girl, to deceive your father and bestow your love upon a base-born—"

"Hold, Sir Guy !" cri 'l Reuben, steraly; "though my linh may be lowly, yet I am not base-born. I own I owe yet much, and will, before I die, strive to di harps that left in full. I own frankly that I love year daughter. Nay, more, I hape some day to make her my wife."

"Never!" cried Sir Guy, flercely. "Viper, you have bitten the hand that has reared you?"

"He who thants a man, Sir Guy, with what he has confirmed, concerns the diffration!" answered Reuben, in Lent. All the limit in the young man's mature was roused, and he was prepared to give blow for blow.

"I. wi m be ar!" said Fitzamold, scornfally.

"It is the actions of a man should be his pride or shane!"

on. Ruinn, proudly. "It may be a misfortune to be lowborn, but it is not a crime."

"Do you dure to barrly words with me!" exclaimed Pitzin. Did drawing his rapier, and advancing a step toward the young man.

I. I was at his shoulder, cocked and leveled full at Fitzarnold's head.

"Let year blade see the sunlight and I'll put a bullet the consert the pure of different texture from those in the head of a poor man."

t. .: its world here his world. So, with a smothered eath, he test his rapir back into its scabbard.

as you!" the lord said, seomfully.

Mand had looked on with auxious eye.

"Reuten! for my sake, forbear."

- "M. J, what is the meaning of this elect meeting with
 - " Yes, lather," March ans wered, trathfully.
- ness I' the enraged father cried.
- I can not help P, fether; the have is in my heat, I I made not deny it." Music faced the storm really
- read to the read of the second to the read to the read
 - " The Sir Gry, I do love her," Reuben said, firmly.
- arnold, with a sneer.
- "Mari, Maril, I little thought that when I reared you, a motherless child, you would inflict this blow upon me," Godal-min said, as much in sorrow as in anger.

"Oh, father, do not be angry with us?" Mand cried; "we could not help our love. Heaven can ed it to spring up in our hearts."

"Enough," eried Sir Guy, sternly; "home with you, Maud, and forget this man. And you, sir, do not dare to darken my door again."

With a farewell glance at the man she loved so well, Mand followed her father.

"Hark ye, young sir," said Fitzarnold, after Sir Guy and Maud had departed, "you have made a fee to-day that few men care to face a second time. Be warned, and leave the colony at once, or it may be the worse for you."

"Lord Fitzarnold, you are not now in England, but in Plymorth; we care little for lords here, we Puritans. Attempt one act of treachery toward me or the girl I love, and I shot you down with as little coremony or remorse as I would feel at killing a wolf that crosses my path in the forest."

And so the rivals parted.

CHAPTER XII.

THE CHALLENGE TO BATTLE.

Ar seven in the evening the colonial forces left Plymouth to supplie Metamora in the woods of Pocasset. Lord Fliz-

In the order of march, flist came Andrews and his source; then Captain Church and his soldiers, in the center of whom marked Figure 1; then the volunteers brought up the r.

It was a long, we say march through the willernes, and the gray streaks of morning light had began to like the cattern sky when the head of the column arrived at the pond called by the Indians Assawampset, and situated about twelve miles from the weeds of Peca set. The plan to surprise the

2-s

In lians at break of day ordered a halt. So, after a consultation, Fitzarnold ordered a halt.

Fruo hous the expellion renaised by the side of the print A sociy brokelet was partiken of by the weary and from the return to a small then exint the march went on.

During the last. An heavy with some half a dezen of the 1-a factor some, including Region El mond, pushed forward to reconnition. At the explication of the two hours, one by the theorem returned. All reported that they had been unable to dispose the slighted trace of the relakins.

All the sports had returned, save one, and that one was not a main residue. In the fighters, but one of the colonial value is, who had juned the secuts without the knowledge of Andrews.

"The field has probably lest himself in the wood," said I happen to full into the hands of the Indians, there will be but little chance of our surprising there."

"It is her that he hath wandered off toward Plymouth," said Captain Church.

En will at waiting for the return of the absent man, the

Fig. 1. 2 the column to persue its vey through the cozy for ...; — the vertex of und chrush and pathless thicket

— no will fill me the first of the colonial volunteer who half then up a him elf the office of scout.

A till, giant Pinkin was he, renowned throughout Plymerk to a as a creat extension speaker in the cause of the Let. He was called Preachapace Jone.

In a many morion—to the of which evidently had seen hard some into the civil war—Prochage or too held the cost the distance, making noise enough to disturb any Indian within limit a mile, although he were drunk with sleep.

Prince Prechapton bose upon his sheetler a heavy of the product the red hins met his eyes. After he had not been for an hour, as he had judged, he thought it time to return to camp. So he logan to retrace his steps. But Preachapace was no woodman, and when a half adoren yards on, he came to a small swamp, and e sayed to go remid it; he became bewildered, and, in the end, set out in a straight line directly opposite to that which he should have followed.

For another weary hour Preachapace stumbled and floun-dered through the tangled thicket.

"Verily, it is strange," he muttered, as he wearly teiled onward, "that I come not to the camp. The forest looks strange, too; I remember it not." Which, considering that every step he took was taking him nearer and nearer to the woods of Pecasset, and that he had never gone that way before, was not to be wondered at.

Another hour passed, and still Preachapace saw no signs of his companions.

"Verily, I believe that I am lost!" Le cried, in dismay.

But a few steps further on and the blue waters of a pend glanling through the trees caught his eye.

"I am right!" cried he, in joy, when his eyes caught sight of the pond. "Yonder is the lakelet by which we rested this morn. Peradventure, I will lift up my voice and call my fellow-warriors." And then the loud shout of the Puritan rung through the forest and scared the linds from their nests.

Preachapace had made a slight mistake. Instead of the pond of Assawampset, he saw the waters of Wattuper, the pond fringed by the woods of Poeusset.

On went the Puritan, briskly, rejoicing that he would seen behold his companions. But, to his wonder, no answering shout rung through the ferest to his call.

"I can not understand it," muttered the bewilered non; "can they have gone and left me behind? Verily, that is unjust, and when I do arrive in the colony, I will lift up my voice and protest against it."

A second more and a tall form darted from I chin I a tree-trunk and precipitated itself upon the astonished Preschapte. A second followed the first, and then a third and fourth. The Puritan was in the hands of the red skins.

Desperately Preachapace struggled, but though numeriar in sinew, he was quickly overpowered by the superior numbers of the Indians.

I) we went the preacher up a his knee, the swages clinging to him. At all brave raised his tomahank to strike.

"It the whose breve sing his death-song, for his soulp shall have the like of Namattah!" coled the Indian.

The planting of the che of the Indian ax dazzled the vising of the heipins man; he doed his eyes to receive the thestroke.

Hill! call a deep voice. "The many hands that take the life of one are the hands of squaws. Shall a flock of the life of a single crow?"

President of held his eyes and beheld the Indian king,

"I serven ler!" eried the Paritan, in terror, for though six my and at at all limb, the gainst Peritan was any thing but a warrior at heart.

demanded the chief.

"I am em of Church's company, verily a colonial unteer," said the Puritan.

"And well the keen above of Metamora's eve showed his interes. "Why didn't then wander from him?"

"I did not wand r," replied the innocent Preschapte, in it is the travial the desires of the colonists to the Wang over chief. "I came on a scout, but I fear me I have may. Thin I savages, het thou seen any thing of Comin Church and his soldiers?"

" Wi re did the pain-free leave the white men?"

" Verily, by the side of this pond."

"Here!" and the Labers started in astonishment; "the pale.

"Very, I do, If you say to, "replication accommodating Indiana, when he is a scalp of yellow in the respective to the re of the white.

it has the pend that your pupile call Assessment?

"Ah!" Now the chief gressed the mistake that the white had made. "The long-knife left the white chiefs by the waters of Assawampset this morning?"

" Yes, chief."

"Ugh!" Quickly the Indian king called two of his braves to him, gave them instructions, and they departed switch through the woods.

"Is not this the pond I speak of, chi f?" asked the Paritim, be inting to think that possibly he had made some tricks a

"The white men books on the waters of Watteper; he is in the woods of Postsse'," answered the Indian.

"Peradventure, I got turned round and came the wring way," said Preachapace, in blank distany to himself. "I come to smite the heathen, and lo, it is I that have been smitten."

"What seeks the white brave in the fore!?"

"Verily, I am not a brave," mackly answered the now humble Preachaptor; "I am a man of porce, although I have on the habiliments of war."

"The pale-face has a squaw's tengue," sold the Indian in contempt; "let him speak sense."

"Don't harry me, filed savage!" cried Preachapte, in terror; "verily, I am discomposed."

"Let the pale-face tell why he is here," cried the chi f, angrily, " or the hatchets of the rel-men will drink his blood."

The termhawk gleaming around the head of the territical Preach space gave ample warning that the threat of the chief was not a jest.

"Spare me?" cried the Puritan, in terror. "I'm going to speak. Verily, give me time to expeand. The men of power in Plymouth colony sent out Captain Church to watch thy movements; and by Captain Church did send out me to fall thy abiling-place, that he might come upon theely samples, and smite thee, hip and thigh?"

"The Wamp mong kills his enemy in the first, eye to epopled the best of his for Metamora does not fear the white-slans, though their remainers be like the balles of grass in the meals of the remainers to like the balles of grass in the meals ow, or the leaves in the forest. Metamora will fight the large knives till he dies. White warrior, go back to your singing the new back to your chief. My warriors shall lead you. Telly or captain that you have son Methania and his warries—that they me really for the fight, and await the white-sit s in the weeks of Pocess t." And the chief drew hims if the properties and livered the bold defiance.

"Today, I will do your libing, hien I savage," sail Preach-s ap untrached them the hands of the Wampanoays.

"Tell your chief, also, that if he does not seek Metamora will two sleeps, then, like the panther, the Wampanoaus will dish up a the white-skins. They will come in a hail-structure of arrows that shall surprise them to their death. Number of that the white brave be conducted toward his last of the conducted toward his

"Verly, I thank thee, fileral ware, for having spared my life, and I opinion that it will be long before thou or any of thy include, or other relations, eath me again within the include."

"It is white brave remember the words of Metamora," said the claid. "The Pore t Kingan's the Wampanenes wait for the whiteshine in the woods of Police t. And if the Lease of the Labelius be not white, they will come, nor will for the release to attack them. Metamora deals the white shine." And then the Indian king turned upon his heal and stalked away.

"Care?" said Namutah, the renegade Mohegan, and the Portion followed the Indian.

CHAPTER XIII.

A DIFFERENCE OF OPINION. .

Arma trav 1 is g the woods for a short time, the two reached a love open globs. In the center of the glade the Indian love love Nonactal love his keen eyes on the woods around. To the gaze watched his movements in astonishment.

"Verily," he muttered to himself, "what is the savege

Then the Indian, seemingly being satisfied, came close to Preachapace, and in a low, guarded tone, addressed Lim.

"Ush! White brave know the Plymouth scout?' sail the Indian.

"Yes, Enoch Andrews," replied the Puritan, wondering at the question. "Verily, I know him well, and a famous man Le is with the carnel weapons of war—"

"White brave talk like chatter-bird," interrupted the In lian, impatiently. "Let him shut his mouth, open his ear, and listen."

"Verily, friend savage, I will do as thou requesteth," said

"Let white brave tell Plymouth scout that he has seen Agawam, the Mohegan-"

"But, chief," interrupted the Paritan, "that will not be the truth; I have seen nothing but Wampanong warriors. That I can tell from the fashion of their habiliments—"

"White listen-no talk!" cried the Indian, impatiently. "Tell Plymouth scout that Agawam, the Mohegan say, no attack Metamora."

"What?" cried Preachapace, beginning to have a dim comprehension that he was receiving information that would be of value to the whites.

"Forest Hing, so many warriers," and the Indian quark and shut his hand until the Paritan had counted live handred.

"Tive handred?" exclaimed Preachaptee, in astonial went.

rifles—plenty powder—plenty every thing."

"Verly, if the a speaker tradic, it will not be well to are put there see sees," said Prochepies, who remember I took the color Lifetees har liy exceeds by him him him is, all to be " No," and the L. Han shoot his had, "no it his -- 1"."

"Verily, I'll run whether the others flight or not," matter I the Parison, who had already had all the Indian fighting that he wanted.

"Yes-ran now-fight some other time," sail the savage,

"Tes, I'll run now without fear," muttered Preachapace, and as for fighting some other time, I'll see about it when the time comes, and verily, I shall not seek the fighting, but wait until it is forced upon me."

"White chief, remember-tell Plymouth scout Forest King all really for white men-wants fight he qu."

"Oh, I'd remember," said the Paritan.

" Come?" And once again the Indian led the way.

The two now had left the forest and were crossing a little plain. Salienly the quick eyes of the Indian caught sight of the advancing scout of the white column in the timber leyond.

"See, white chiefs!" he cri d, and then he plunged into the wool from whence they had come, and disappeared.

Joyfully Preachapace ran forward as fast as his long legs would carry him, and had a narrow escape from being shot by one of the scouts, who, seeing him advance from the direction of Pocasset, mistook him at the first glance for an Indian.

Andrews was at the head of his mea, who were but a few handred pades in alwance of the main body. He listened at utively to the story of Preachapaed's adventures, and his low challed when he heard of the bold defiance of the Wamparoux, and of the warning of the Indian who had called himself Agrwam, the Maharun.

Andrews waited until Captain Church and Lord Fitzarnold came up. Then Preachapage told his story over again, while the two listened with attention.

when the Puritan had finished.

If a both the used blaster of the sevace, who thinks to the constant such that it is a larger than a safe ten to one that it we always a this stronghold, in the woods of Posses, who have sub-larger us to introduce the Indians will fly be a seven that of sheep," said Pitzamoid, scornfully.

I be given pur on, may lord," sold the scout, Andrews, quirty, "but, you don't know this Metamora. For a savare, he has next natural talent for war. He fights both according to savare and civilized rales. He has been known to lead his a continuous the open field and receive a charge of soldiers as though he himself headed regular troops. His warriors stood the charge and repulsed it—something very rare for the red skins, who soldom fight in masses. If this chief sends a bold defiance to buttle—such as he has sent—you may rest assured that he is ready to receive us."

"Friend scout, I am afraid that your life of woodcraft has made you timid, and that you overrate the prowess of this brute Indian."

"If your lordship had been in the fight at Swansey, a year ago, when this same Metamora whipped the colonial forces so handsomely, I think you'd change your opinion of this brute Indian," answered Andrews, not in the best temper in the world.

"Possibly I might," said Fitzarnold, in scorn; "but, as a soldier, I am not used to be frightened at a shadow, or to retire from the field until I have at least felt the foe and ascertained his strength."

"By the report brought by Jones from the Indian, Metamora has five handred warriors with him," said the secret.

"Can you rely upon this Indian who sent the report of Metamora's strength?" asked Capt in Church.

"He has never yet deceived me," answered the scout.

"If the report be true, my lord," said Church, "the savages are five to one against us."

"A wise General always reports his force double what it really is; and if this Indian be such a skillful leader, as you all seem to think, it is probable that he understands how to double his force in reports."

Fitzarnold would not be convinced; he was determined to go forward.

I hope, Captain Church, that you have no idea of giving up the attack simply because this savage has used some hig words and tried to frighten us by a report of the number of his warriors," he said.

"To say the truth, my lord," sail Church, hone ly, " if the reports that have been brought in be true — and I see no reason to doubt'em —it would be madness to go on. It would be but to certain defeat."

"Then you think that it would be advisable to retreat without even making an attempt to find out the strength of this tavage's force," said Fitzarnold, with a clearly-defined encer upon his face.

"Since you ask my advice, my lord, I must fain reply that I do a lyise a retreat," said Church, who did not relish the successing tone of the English lord. "If you remember, our plan was to surprise this chief, and give him battle before he could collect his warriors and prepare for us."

"Very true," said Titzarnold, impatiently.

"It is very evident that we can not carry out that plan, since he is informed of our approach, and has sent us a bold defiance to battle."

"That is true, also."

- "And if the Indians are five to one against us, posted, too, peradventure, in a strong position—for this Metamora has the eye of a European for selecting a battle-ground—the odds are so great in their favor, that for us to retreat without going into battle is. I think, no disgrace." Church spoke carnettly and honestly. A soldier tried in the fire of many a limity conflict, it was plain that prudence, not fear, dictated his words.
- "Retreat!" cried Fitzarnold, hotly; "return to the colony like whipped dogs, somed by an empty threat? Now, by my sul, I do not won by that this Indian Ring has be denothed colonial treats of they go into the fight prepared to retreat."
- "My lord, I have but spoken what is in my mind, nor do I think it shows either cowardice or but soldiership to counsel a retreat from overwhelming numbers!" exclaimed Church, his anger rising at Fitz modd's words.

"Is this savage a demon, that he beats the colonists with works alone?" said Fitzernold, contemptuously.

"My lord, if we come to blows with this chief, you will ful that the colonists can fight as we'll as any soldiers that the wail ever saw," returned Church, quickly.

It is a pity that such good sol liers should retreat from a land it it is a pity that such good sol liers should retreat from a land it is it is a pity that such good sol liers should retreat from a land it is a pity that such good sol liers should retreat from a land it is a pity that such good sol liers should retreat from a land it is a pity that such good sol liers should retreat from a land it is a pity that such good sol liers should retreat from a land it is a pity that such good sol liers should retreat from a land it is a pity that such good sol liers should retreat from a land it is a pity that such good sol liers should retreat from a land it is a pity that such good sol liers should retreat from a land it is a l sneeringly.

"My and, I have given counsel against attacking these In-will not find Captain Church in the rear," exclaimed the sol-

"If I give the command to advance, you will obey my orders, then?"

"Yes, my lord," Church answered, "I am a soldier, and know my duty."

"Very well, then; we'll attack these savages at once," said Fitzarnold; "that is, if we can find them, which I doubt. For I think that this wily Indian king has attempted to frighten us from our purpose by empty boasts."

"The arrogant fool!" muttered Andrews to Esmond, who stood next to him. "If I miss not my guess, Metamora will handle him so roughly within the next two hours that some of the conceit will be taken out of him."

"Five to one against us, and the red-men fighting on their own ground: I'm afraid that some of us will never see Plymouth town again," said Esmond. And then to his mind came the image of fair Maud Godalmin, the girl he loved so well, and whom, perchance, it was fated that he ne'er should see again.

"You are determined to advance, my lord?" Church asked.

"Yes," answered Fitzarnold; "at least, we'll try the strength of Metamora's position. If we find it too strong to be assailed with hopes of success, then it will be time to talk of retreating."

Fitzurold did not know what a retreat was in the New World, in the face of warriors frenzied for blood.

"You are in commend of the expelition, my lord; on your sheat lers, then, rests the responsibility," said Church.

"They are broad enough to bear it," returned Lazarnold, har theily. "Let us advance at once. We have already lost too much time."

being in the advance, as before.

The column reached the pond of Wattaper, approaching it from the castward and striking the little lake about its on-ter. Then the troops faced to the south and march dalong the borders of the water to the woods of Pocasset, which fringed the southern end of the pond.

Between the woods and the line of march of the whites was a little open plain, about a quarter of a mile wide.

An lrews skillfully led the whites down along the timber that fringed the plain on the east, and then the troops halted to form for the attack on the Indians' line of battle.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE FIGHT AT POCASSET.

In the wigwam of Metamora sat Nameokee, the wife of the chief. The heart of the Indian girl was sad. The spirit of her base had fied to the spirit land, and now Metamora was about to take the war-path against the whites.

"Me' amera comes not," marmure! Nameokee, "and the soul of the rel-man's wife is filled with grief. She fears that he is in the power of the cruck pale-faces, who will take his IN." Then the Indian wife sprung to her feet. "Why do I hager here, when the life of my chief is in danger?" she call. "I will sack the wigwam of the pale-faces, and if I can not give Metamora I will die with him?"

But, as she was about to carry out the heroic resolve, the skin that serve has a door to the wigwam was pushed aside, and Metamora entered.

"Y a are sue!" cried the girl. "You have returned to "Metenerallas returned, but the white man is on his track," will the chief. "The stry of the Wampanong king must be short. The warshatchet is unburied, and the red-man must detend their wigwams."

Name of the Name of the War is of the red chief. A conflict was at hand.

"Mr an ora!" she cried, "do not wait the coming of the Properties Forest King replied, and his eyes shot glances of 2 me as he spoke:

"What, Manasokee? Shall the red chief leave the graves of his fathers and the hunting-grounds he has reamed over since he first learned to draw the bow? Shall the white man enjoy the land which the Great Spirit gave to the Indian? No! Sooner will Metamora see his tribe swept away one by one! Sooner shall the name of Wampunoag perish from the earth than Metamora tamely yield the lands of his fathers to the grasp of the pale-faces."

Nameokee looked upon the chief with pride. There spoke the brave heart that had made the Wampanoag chief king of the red-men, and given him a power greater than any ever wielded by Indian chief in New England.

"Metamora speaks with the scream of the eagle," said the wife. "Nameokee will repine no more. She will share all his danger, and live or perish with him."

" Nameokee has the heart of a brave!" exclaimed the chief.

"She is worthy to be the wife of Metamora."

Then, through the forest rung the low, guarded war-whoop of the Wampanoags.

"My braves come!" cried the Indian king, as the sound of the Wampanoag yell fell upon his cars. "My people are upon the war-path. Nameokee, remain here. Venture not within the forest until we drive the white skins in dismay across the plain."

Then forth from the wigwam went the chief.

In the little open space in front of his lodge, he found assembled the chief warriors of the Wampanoag tribe.

"Metamora!" cried an old warrior, who bore on his person the sear of many a fearful wound, "the pale-faces are in the forest, led on by Captain Church. The braves of the Wainpanongs thirst for blood."

"Ugh! they shall swim in it!" cried Metamora, fleredy.
"The scalps of the pale faces shall hang thick in the wigwards of the Wampanoags; they shall dry and whiten in the stable of the lodges, and attest the vengrance of the red men."

"Metamora speaks words of fire!" cried the old warr.or; "the Wampinougs listen with open ears; their hearts are warmed by the tongue of their king. They will fight until they die against the false white man."

"My warriors shall hi le among the trees," cried the Indian king. "Let no brave fire his rifle till the crack of the chief's gun frightens the forest-birds from their nests. When the pale-faces are entangled in the swamp, then, from the woods of Pockeset the red-men will burst upon them like a thunder cloud."

"The warriers of the Wampanoags hear the words of their chief," replied the old brave, "they listen and they will obey,"

" How many braves have the pule-faces?" asked Metamora.

"Few warriors—not a hundred," answered one of the chiefs, who had been on the watch to detect the approach of the whites.

"We will give their souls to the Bad Spirit that sent them across the Big Salt Lake to steal the lands of the red-men, and their bodies to the wolves?" cried Metamora, fiercely.

Then forth to the edge of the woods went the Wampanongs and placed themselves in ambush to receive the attack of the colonists.

The position chosen by Metamora was a very strong one naturally. The pond of Wat uper on the left and a dense swamp on the right, prevented any successful attempt to flank his line of battle. Besides, the swamp extended along the whole front of the Italian line, save here and there, where narrow fathways of firm soil led into the woods.

The colonists, forming under cover of the timber, prepared for the attack.

The Indians are evidently in yonder thicket—a strong position," said Church, surveying the scene before him with a soldier's eye.

"Hal I not bet'er advance with my scouts and endeavor to draw the fire of the relishins?" asked Andrews. "By thing alvantage of that line of bushes," and the scout pointed to the plain to the right of the Indians' line, "I shall be able to cover my men almost up to the very edge of the timber."

"No," replied Fitzarnold, "we will make a direct charge acres the plain; we can easily drive them from their steller."

"But, my lord!" cried Andrews, in astonishment, and unally to resist showing what the fatal effect of such an attack must be, "our man will have to cross this open plain without their and exposed to the fire of the Indians."

"I do not expect to dislodge the fee without suffering some loss. If we attack them boldly, they will give way before us and fly. These savages will never stand to receive a regular attack."

"That may be true," said the Plymouth scout, blantly, "but if our men are shot down before they reach the timber there won't be any left to make an attack."

"Fellow!" cried Fitzarnold, in a rage, "do you command this expedition or I?"

"You command it, but it would be a devilish sight better for Plymouth colony if you didn't—as some of these poor fellows will find to their cost, if you are mad enough to charge across this open plain right in the fire of Matamora's rifles."

"Captain Church, arrest that fellow!" cried Fitzarnold, exasperated beyond measure by the bold words of the scout.

"But, my lord, I have no authority," said Church, trying to calm the storm. "Andrews and his scouts are volunteers."

"By heaven, if you were a sol lier of mine, I'd have you broke for this!" exclaimed the lord.

"But I am no soldier of yours," returned Andrews, definally, "nor will I lead my men across this open space to be slaughtered in cold blood by the savages."

"Return then to Plymouth, like the coward that you are!"

cried Fitzarnold.

"I am neither a coward nor a rash-headed feel," said the scout; "I'd not return to Plymouth, but I'll stay here with my men to cover your retreat, after the Indians have whipped you, soundly. To cover, scouts!" he cried. Then, with his twenty men he sourht shelter among the trees.

"Advance!" cried Fi'zarnold, as, drawing his rapier, Le led the colonists to the attack.

Quickly, title in hand, in servied rank, the whites a lyanged across the open meadow.

The forest before them shows no sign of hostile In lin.

"They have fled before us!" cried Fitz resold, as a limity—for the English lord, whatever his faults, was no coward—he led the charge.

The colonists were within a hundred yards of the Pecast woods, when the sharp crack of a rifle broke the stillness of the morning.

It was Metamora's answer to the vaunt of Fitzarnold.

Asollier went down headlong on the grass, shot through the temple.

The from the quiet forest came a blaze of flame-shot

f. lowed shot in quick succession.

Remains the fire, the colonists rushed onward to become en-

Strengthing in the morass, the column received another deadly villey from the red-skins. The forest seemed alive with In-Class. The war-who p of the Wampanoags pealed upon the air.

With half their number stricken down by the point-blank fire of the savages, the colonists wavered, paused, and then fled in fruitie retreat across the little plain upon which their comrades lay dying, or dead.

Physical I himself—who had, as by a miracle, escaped the bill is of the Indians, though in the front of the attack—did not attempt to stem the current of retreat that set in so strongly. But, fully realizing that he was beaten, he fled with the rest.

With will shouts of victory the Indians followed in pursuit.

It became a race for life.

The establists caryed to gain the friendly shelter of the works from whence they had come, while the Indians, flushed with victory, dashed headlong across the plain. But, as the Wampanougs came within range, they received a raking fire from Andrews and his scouts, who were posted in the timber on the right.

Almost every shot told; and some fifteen or eighteen braves went down upon the meadow-grass, stricken unto death—the war-war op of triamph changed to the cry of anguish.

Paring that he was being led into an ambuscade, the wily

I. I in king instantly sought shelter with his warrious.

An 'reas with his secuts had, as he prelicted, covered the i in a ci the colonists, and saved them from total extermina-

1. 1.

Once within the shelter of the wood, Fitzarnold gave the crief is a precipite retreat to Plymouth. There was little to I is never for orders, for the colonists—save some ten ment at had remained with Captain Church, and had united with the sounts—were already in flight.

Thirty men had fallen in the attack !

The colonists who had remained together, under the lead of Andrews, who was well acquainted with the country, retreated hastily for Plymouth.

The savages, rendered fearful by the unexpected fire poured into them by the scouts, delayed the pursuit so long that the whites were enabled to escape.

The main body of the colonial expedition reached Plymouth about night-fall and told the story of the defeat.

One by one the stragglers came in.

The defeat had been a fearful one, for over fifty men were missing, nearly one-half of the colonial force. Truly, Plymouth town mourned sorely, and many a curse was leveled at the head of Lord Fitzarnold, who, by his rashness, had caused the sad disaster.

To the astonishment of the Plymouth scout, Reulen Esmond was among the missing!

Diligently the scout inquired if any one had seen the young man. Esmond had not been in the fatal charge but had ambushed with the scout. Andrews could not guess what had become of him, for none had seen him fall.

CHAPTER XV.

THE PRICE OF A LIFE.

Sin Guy received the tilings of the defeat with dismay.

"This is most unlucky," he cried, in alarm; "we shall have every red-skin on our borders up in arms again."

"To tell the truth, Sir Guy," said Fitzarnold, "I am already sick and tired of New England. This war with save as is not to my liking. Once I am your daughter's husband, I shall sail for England."

"Indeed, my lord!" said Sir Guy, astenished at the saiden decision.

"Yes, I have been soundly benten by this red savage. Though I was blind enough to run into his trap, I am sensible struct your daughter to look upon me as her future husband. Here the marriage take place as soon as possible, and I will we sharp hands of the New World forever." Fitzarnold felt sore over his defeat, and he was well aware that it would not cause the colonists to regard him with favorable eyes.

"Well, my lord, I will instruct my daughter as regards her dry at once," said Sir Guy. "I fear me much that she will mourn for this young Reuben, who, I believe, is reported to Live fallen by the hands of the savages."

"Yes, he is among the missing," returned Fitzarnold. "It is better for our purpose that he is out of the way, for, were he will living, your child—with all the foolish tenderness of youth—might be hard to bend unto our will, for the love she bears this low-born hound."

"Ah, but this Reuben may not have perished by the hands of the Indians," sail Sir Guy. "He may be wandering in the weed, and yet gain the shelter of the settlement."

"There is little possibility of that," said Fitzarnold.

- "I am not sure of that, my lord," returned Sir Guy; "'tis
- "Takt is a mistake," said Fitzarnold, "for I myself saw him fall."
 - " Indeed?"
- "Yes, it was after we had attacked the Indians in the wood in prepalsed and retreated across the plains. The Indians were in hot pursuit. As I gained the shelter of the wood, I noted this fellow, whom they call Reuben, ambushed behind a too. A velley was fired by the scouts—of which he was consent the pressing relishins; it was the volley that cheeked the pressing relishins; it was the volley that cheeked the pressing relishins; it was the volley that cheeked the pressing relishins; it was the volley that cheeked the provide at the street us. After the smoke cleared away, I noted this fillow strengter—put his hand to his head as if he at the fall, apparently lifeless, to the ground. Then I give the order to retreat, and thinking the man dead I paid to head to hish. At such a time, it was each man for himself, and in head to hish. At such a time, it was each man for himself, and in head to save him, for it would only have cost more live."
 - "There can be little doubt then as to his fate."
 - " None in the least," said Fitzarnold; "he had evidently

"Child! child!" exclaimed Godalmin, in desperation, "what if my life hang on your answer."

" Your life?" Maud asked, in wonder.

"Ay, my life!" repeated Sir Guy; "the life of him who gave you being."

"How can your life hang upon my decision?" sie asked, not able to comprehend his strange words.

"Listen and I will tell you," said Sir Guy, in agitation.
"Suppose that I was in peril—that my life or death depended upon thee, and one little word would save me, wouldst thou speak that word?"

"My father, thou dost but try thy child," answered Maud, quickly; "thou knowest I would."

"Mand, my life is in thy hands," exclaimed Sir Goy, earnestly. "Become Fitzarnold's wife and I am saved; refase, and I am doomed."

"Father, I can not understand your meaning!" cried the bewildered girl.

"Oh Mand! Mand! must I speak still more plainly?" said the deeply-agitated father. "Years ago, in England, I committed what king Charles now considers a crime, though then all England applanded the act. Fitzamold bears the warrant to seize me and send me in chains back to England. Once there, one doom alone, the scaffold and the ax! Fitzamold has discovered my secret—that I am the man be seeks. He asked thee as the price of silence. Become his wife, he will held his peace, and will never reveal to mort domain man my secret."

"And if I refuse to become his?" asked the hapless Man!, who saw no escape from the terrible coil that circumstances were weaving around her.

back to England, and the rabble will jeer and taunt when the head of the Puritan rolls beneath the ax."

"Oh, father," mouned Maud, "this is terrible."

"My fate is in your lands—you can save me, if you will!" cried Sir Guy, imploringly.

"But, father, to manry a man that I know I can never love!" exclaimed Mand, in agony.

"Wouldst thou rather see thy father-who to thee has always been kind and true-dragged from his home and friends to grave the smileli of King Chules?' demanded Sir Gay.

" No, no, father," cried Mand, "you know I love you."

"Prove, then, that love; become this lord's wife and save met from the formal domn that is banging over me. Thy lover has fallen by the hands of the red-skins. You break no falth. Oh, Mau I, I do not use the father's right; I do not commonly or to accept Lord Fitzarnold, as a husband, but I implose you by the love you bear me to save me from shame and a dreadful death."

"And if I consent to become this man's wife, he will keep this drea that serret?" Mand asked.

"Yes," Sir Gay answered, "he has pledged me by his name and knighthood that his lips will remain forever scaled as to my seer t."

"To save you, father, I consent!" And oh, the pain it gave the young girl to utter the few simple words.

"But, oh! how wretched my future life will be," murmured the girl. The puller of the face—the weary look of the eyes, and the bloodless hips, teld fully of the anguish that wrung her Leart.

"You will soon forget your gricfs," said Sir Guy, who had lent his daughter to his will easier than he had anticipated.
"Lord Gillert's love will make you forget the past."

Then Sir Gry left his daughter, eager to inform Fitzarnold that Mand would accept his suit.

Man is pillow that night was wet with many a scalding tear as she thought of deal Reuben Edmond.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE CAPTIVE OF THE WAMPANOLUS.

It was arranged that the marriage of Maud and Fitzarnold should take place in a month. Sir Guy pleaded for as much time as possible, in order that his daughter should become to notice to the union. The father saw plainly that Maud's grief was deep indeed.

The week that followed the one in which the fight at Pocasset had taken place, was full of stirring events to the colonists of New England.

After the defeat of the whites at Pocasset, Metamonish ad not let the grass grow under his feet. With a large force of Indians he attacked Swansey and burnt nearly all of the town to the ground. Then he swept up northward to the country of the Nipmucks. The brand and steel marked the track of the avenging red-skins.

The rulers of the whites grew alarmed. All the fighting men in the colonies were called forth to subdae the terrible Forest King. To Captain Church was given the command of the expedition against Philip, which consists I of some five hundred men, drawn from every town from the Connecticut river to the Saco.

Lord Fitz arnold, who had announced his intention to return to England, accompained the expedition as a volunteer. He was anxious to redeem his character in the eyes of the colonists.

Metamora, after sweeping like a sirocco to the northwar!, leaving death and desolation in his track, was repeated to be again in the neighborhood of Swansey. Acting on that report, the expedition healed toward the sea.

Andrews and his seouts were, as usual, in the advance.

The colonists were burning with a desire to wipe out the dinstrous defeat that they hell sustained at Pecasset at Metamora's hands; and eagerly they pressed onward to meet the Forest King.

Metamora, hearing through his spies of the advance of the whites, had not been idle. Calling in all his warriers that he could muster—some seven hun hed—he took post in a large swamp, situated between two small rivers—and called by the Indians, Musquaporg—in what is now the township of Rehoboth.

The position chosen by the Indian chief to receive the attack of the whites was much stronger by nature, even, than the one that he had occapied in the woods of Pocasset, and where he had repulsed the colonists with such loss.

So in the swamp of Musquapong, the Indian king and his confederates waited for the approach of the whites. The redskins, flushed with an uninterrupted career of victory, felt little doubt that they would again beat the pale-faces should they dare to seek the real chicks in their forest-lair.

And now we will return to the young scout, Reuben Es-

In the amb ish assigned him by Andrews, Reuben had seen of the Wanny mones, and retreat in disorder.

As the panie-stricken fugitives came toward the cover of the timb r that concealed the scouts, Reuben recognized Lord Fazzandal, dashing at fall speed directly for the particular point of the wood that concealed the young man.

"How easily I could shoot him down now, in this confusion, and no one the wiser," muttered the young scout, as he glance lat his ride lying so handy, already cocked, upon his arm. But the next moment he dismissed the thought as unweitly. "It would be the act of a coward!" he said. "I should not be worthy Maud's love could I do so base an ter!"

Then Fitzarn all, breathless and with a pistel in his hand, dashed into the wood within a dozen paces of the scout.

The living of the Inlians in pursuit diverted the attention of Real inform Fitzurnold. Leveling his rifle, he "sighted" a tall Indian and tumbled him over. Dropping the butt of his fille to reload, Reuben half turned his head, and, to his ast dishment, he saw Fitzarnold, with a look of demon-like triangle, leveling his pittel at him. With a cry of rage at the therefore of his rival, Reuben essayed to avoid the shot. The movement, however, was made too late, for the bullet of the transferous English lord plowed its way across the top of the young man's head. Apparently lifeless, Reuben fell to the grant.

It is all the stanned, was but slightly wounded. The

S Ni.

W. n R uten recovered his senses, he found himself in an I. Han wignam, bound hund and foot, and guarded by a stal-

"Where am I?" was the natural inquiry of the young

"Ugh I white brave in the hands of the Wampanoags," answered the Indian.

Then back to the mind of the young Puritan came the memory of the fight and his attempted assassination by his treacherous rival.

Reuben felt a dull yet not very agonizing pain from the wound on his head; so he quickly concluded that he could not be very badly wounded.

"The white chiefs run fast," said the warrior. "The Forest King is a great brave—take many scalps."

"What will Mand think?" mused the white prisoner, without paying heed to the words of the savage. "What will she think when the wretched remains of the expedition enters Plymouth, and she finds that I am absent? Will she not believe me dead—believe that I have fulen by the hands of the red-skins? Then, too, if Fitzarnold reaches Plymouth in safety, will be not be apt to report me dead—not revealing his agency in the matter—that he had attempted to kill me?"

These thoughts were bitter indeed to the mind of the young scout.

"Patience, patience," he murmured. "I think Mau I will keep her faith with me for a little while—at least until she learns whether I be really dead or alive. I may find means to send her word that I am living. I may be able to escape from the hands of these sayages."

And with these thoughts Reuben console! Limself.

The young scout was carried by the Indians to the swamp of Musquapoag, where they had left their squaws, children and old men when they departed on their expedition to the north. He was strictly guarded, and no opportunity to escape presented itself. As each day wore on, and the wound on his head became better and better, his enforced stay in the Indian camp became more and more irksome. Reuben had been the only prisoner captured at the fight at Poerset, and the savages prized him accordingly. Unceasing was the vigilance with which they watched their prisoner. At list Metamora returned from his northern expedition, and took up his quarters in the swamp to await the approach of the whites.

Reuben was now in despair. If he had not been able to escape when surrounded only by the women and old men, how could be hope to achieve freedom when the swamp was thick with Indian warriors?

"Oh Mand, Mattel !" Le cried, in agony, "shall I ever see y :r f.ce ag in? Bitter were the thoughts of the young

In the

"I might as well have died by Fitzarnold's pistol-shot!" he crie! "as to linger out my life here, a captive in the hands of the relations. I suppose I am intended for the torturestake by these devils. I am afraid that I shall never set eyes on Man! Godalmin again."

As Realen lay on the couch in the little wigwam that served as his prison, in lalging in these gloomy thoughts, a tall In Tan walke I into the lodge, and without ceremony seated him elf on the floor by the sile of the captive.

" How white brave feel now?" asked the Indian.

" As well as can be expected, chief, considering that I am a prisoner in the hands of your people," answered Reuben, quietly.

The Indian then surveyed the leggins and moccasins of Reuben, with a look of curiosity.

" Will des white chief wear Indian dress?" asked the sav-0.73.

" I am a scout-one who fights the red-men in the red-men's way," unswered the young man.

" White brave know. Plymouth scout?" said the Indian,

Cardenay.

" Yes, I am one of his warriors," replied Reuben, wondering at the savege's knowledge of Enoch Andrews.

"Big were re-Phymouth scout," said the brave, gravely. I'm a ment he remained silent, apparently in deep thought.

Tien be spoke again:

" Metamora here now - many warriors - fighting-men many as trees in forest. White chiefs up north—many warriors to me to fight Indian king in the swamp of Musqua-1 . 7. 77 .

It is heart gave a great bound at the news. The coloniss, then, were a lyn: cing to attack the Indians! If the attack was seccessful, it would probably give him freedom.

" Fercel King, though, more braves than pale-faces. Is the white chief well? Is he strong?" asked the Indian, sud-

"Yes," replied Reuben, astonished at the question.

"When the sun goes to sleep, let the white chief be as watchful as the wolf that howls in the forest. Let him hear like the owl and walk like the wild-cat. Agawam is a Mohegan, and his heart warms to his white brother."

Hope sprang up in the heart of the helpless prisoner: help was at hand.

"Trust me, chief," he said. "I shall be watchful."

"let him make believe sleep like the fox when he waits for rabbit. When the night comes, then will come Agawam the Mohegan. He will cut the cords that bind the white man. He will lead him by the panther's paths through the swamp to the long-knives." And then the Indian departed, leaving behind him hope and joy.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE SURPRISE AT MUSQUAPOAG.

Long seemed the hours to the helpless prisoner in the Indian wigwam, till the shade of night descended upon the earth and covered wood, plain and tangled swamp alike with its mantle of inky hue.

But at last the darkness came. The hum of the Indian camp was hushed into silence. Sleep was upon the Wampanorgs. The sentinels upon the outskirts of the camp kept vigilant watch, lest the pale-faces should attempt a surprise by night, for the colonial troops were encamped in the woods to the north of the swamp, waiting for the daylight to come to advance to the attack.

The white troops had been handled with exceeding skill and caution.

Captain Church's generalship, so far, had proved the wisdom of those who urged his appointment to the command of the expedition. The Indian captive, though informed by the friendly savage of the approach of the whites, had little idea that his friends were so near.

Wearily in the darkness of his prison Reuben waited. No sound without came to his ears save the croaking of the frogs in the swamp and the cries of the night-birds and insects.

As well as the scout could judge, it was near midnight when the sound of a light footfall near the door of the wigwam attricted his attention. A moment more and an Indian entered.

The warrior cut the thongs that bound the captive, and once again Reulen stood upon his feet free!

The Indian then cast a blanket over the shoulders of the young man.

"Put role over head," said the chief, in a low, guarded voice, "follow sel warrior. If Wampaneag brave see us—no tell white secut from Indian. Tread softly. Come."

Then forth from the hut went the Indian, followed by Reulen.

The Mollegan had contrived to be appointed to guard the white prisoner, and so was enabled to free him.

Cautiously, through a little path in the swamp, the Indian conducted the white. They saw no signs of the Wampanoag sentiles. It was evident to Reuben that the path they were thoughn was known only to his guide. It was, as he had the path therepath through the jungle.

In filtern minutes after leaving the wigwam, the two stood in the words that fliesed the swamp on the north. They were teyend the Indian outposts. The path emerged from the swamp class by the little river that formed the western Loundary of Musquapoag.

"Can the white chief follow the path that he has come had to the wigwams of Metamora?" asked the chief, after they had gained the friendly shelter of the wood.

" Yes," replied Reuben.

"The white chief will find the pale-faces encamped in the first there," and the Indian pointed to the cast. "Let the white trave go to his brothers—lead them by the panthermath to the wigwams of the Wampanoags. They must be as the wild-cat when he steads upon his prey. If the palefaces are cumning they can come upon Metamora in his sleep and strike him to his death." There was an expression of ferocious joy in the voice of the Indian and in his dusky face as he planned the surprise of the Forest King.

"I shall remember," said Reuben, who saw at once that if he could lead the colonists to the heart of the Indian camp without alarming the savages, it must inevitably result in the complete defeat of the Wampanoags, and, of course, of great honor to himself.

"Good! let the pale-faces use the cunning of the fox and the claws of the panther." Then the red chief again entered the swamp.

Reuben proceeded cautiously forward in the direction of the white line. He knew that there was some little danger of his being mistaken for an Indian by the white sentinels and shot without warning.

He had advanced some three hundred paces when a man rose from a clump of bushes almost at his side.

- "Reuben Esmond!" cried the ambushed white.
- " Enoch Andrews!" replied Reuben.

The recognition was mutual.

- "Alive, by hookey!" cried Andrews, in glee, grasping the young man by the hand, warmly.
 - "Yes," returned Reuben; "was I reported dead?"
- "Of course! Lord Fitzernold said that he had seen you fall, stricken down by an Indian bullet."
- "The destardly villain," said Reuben, in heat; " he attempted to assissinate me. I was wounded, but the ball came from the pistol of this leading, who, some thirty paces in the rear of me, fired at my back."
 - "The infernal skunk!" exclaimed Andrews, in in light-
 - "I fell into the hands of the Indians, and have been a prisoner in yonder swamp ever since."
 - " How dil you escape?" An hews askel.
 - "By the assistance of a savage who called himself Agaman, the Mohegan."
 - "I know him !" excluimed the secut.
 - " He conducted me by a secret path-unknown, I think, to the Wampaneags-from the swamp. By that path I can lead our troops right into the heart of the Indian village."

" Metamora, then, is in our hands!" cried Andrews.

" Yes."

"No time must be lost," said the scout, quickly. "I'll take you at once to Captain Church. Church commands the expelition. Lord Fitzarnold and Sir Guy Godalmin are with us; but Fitzarnold is simply as a volunteer, and Sir Guy has given the command to Captain Church."

"When I return to Plymouth, I will call Fitzarnold to an account for his attempt upon my life," said Reuben, as the two proceeded onward through the wood. "He must either meet me in a fair and open fight, or I'll post him throughout all New Ergland as a coward and an assassin,"

"If you succeed in leading this party to Metamora's strong-hol! and beat him, there is no military office in the gift of the colony that they will refuse you. Metamora has chilled the whole heart of New England with dread, and mothers frighten their babes to shop with his name."

An hews conducted Reuben to Captain Church, who had bivouacked at the fort of a large oak, without any other shelter than that afforded by the branches of the tree.

Engerly Church listened to the story of the escape of the young scout.

"You say that you can lead a party by this secret path to the conter of the swamp without being discovered by the redmen?" asked Church.

" Yes, en tain," answered Reuben.

"By Heaven! if you can do so, we can exterminate these Indians," cried Church, whose able mind saw at once how decisive such a surprise must be.

"If I might suggest," said the Plymouth scout, "let Esmould have my scouts and some fitty of the Massachusetts men, who are all good Indian-fighters, for the surprise, and at the same time you, with the rest, attack the savages in the front."

The plan is good," said Church, after a moment's thought.

It shall be certical out. If we succeed in destroying these energy, Esmetal, you may claim any reward you like from the colony. Metamora's head is worth a thousand pounds, and it will be through you alone that the Indians are placed in our power."

The arrangements for the attack were soon made. At the heal of the Plymouth scouts and the Massachusetts Indian-fighters—the stout men of B ston, of Salem, and of Saco—Reuben Esmond went; while Captain Church marshaled the rest of his force in warlike array, ready to attack the Indians in the front when the sounds of carnage preclaimed Esmond's surprise of the Wampaneag camp.

Cautiously as the will-cat steals upon his prey, the young see it led on the Indian-fighters. They gained the center of the swamp without discovery. They seemed like so many grim plantoms, as, with lifte in hand, they glided along in single file through the mazes of the swamp. He long the wigwams of the sleeping Indians appeared before them.

With a yell that rung upon the ears of the surprised Warapanougs like the knell of deem, the whites dashed upon their prey.

A little watch-fire burning by one of the lodges gave bran is into the hands of the white men, and soon the blaze of the burning wigwams added new horrors to the scene.

The Indians, surprised in their sleep, rushed forth to be shot down by their merciless foes. Captain Church, with the main body of the colonists, had advanced to the attack at the first sounds of conflict.

Though surprised and attacked in the very midst of their camp, the red-men fought bravely. For a full hour the Lattle raged on. The Ferest King, in the thickest of the combat, seemed to bear a charmed life. Many a rifle drew "beat" on him, yet no white man's bullet struck the chief.

Vain was the strungle. Fort by foot the savages gave ground, though still contending desperately.

"At 'em again!" cried Sir Gny, waving his long region, dripping with blood, and flashing crimson in the red glass of the burning wigwams, while his gray hair and beard streamed wildly in the nin.

Metamora, with some twenty warriors, was retreating as if to gain the shelter of the swamp behind. Sir Guy led on a small knot of the colonists—among whom was Lord Fitzarnoll—intent on taking the red chief Boldly the whites dashed upon the band of the Porest King-bitter was their recognion.

With a swing of his powerful arms, Metamora crushed in the best of Sir Gay, with the batt of his rifle. With a shrick of anglish, Galdmin went down upon the earth, dead! Fitzurn 11, pressing forward to avenge Sir Guy's death, was struck by an Indian arrow, and fell to the ground by Sir Guy's side.

The colonits, and I by the fall of their two leaders, paused in the art. A. The Indians gained the swamp, and then each brave for hims if took refage in heallong flight.

The fight half been long and bloody, but the victory was complete, though the loss of the colonists had been fearful. But, the end was achieved. The power of the Wampanoags was broken, and Metamora was a fagitive.

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE LAST OF THE WAMPANOAGS.

In the wigwam of Metamora at Mount Hope, sat the chief up a coach of skina. Gloomy and sallen was the face of the ward r. His little, dained with blood—the gore of the deadful fight—lay across his knees.

By the side of the Porest Ring steed Nameokee, his wife.

1 in the a time exerts of the past few hours.

Heather whiles got. Incress to the very center of his camp to the while the best of their preserve that the private that they we red when rushing to the the

M. r. r. r. M. L. L. ru," said Non-okee, as sally slong at the late to cheer the heart.

L. r. r. r. of the pull-laces—thou art here to cheer the heart.

c: thy Nameokec."

olicit in mournful tones; "he will be the last chief of his tribe.

While him will perish the name of Wampanoag." The chief gave vent to a deep sigh. "The braves of his tribe sleep in the swamp and in the forest, where they fell by the rifles and knives of the pide faces. Metamora has no longer a resting-place. The mighty chief of a thousand warriors is now a wan lever in the land that Manitou gave to his fathers."

"Ah, my chief," said the In iian wife, sadly, "am I not a sharer in your wanderings? Am I not with you to soothe your sorrows?"

The heart of the red-man's wife clung as closely to him in the hour of defeat and danger as it had done when Metamora was king over all New England, and was driving the whites before him like chaff before the wind.

"Bless thee, Nameokee," said the chief, fondly, "thou hast ever proved thy love."

"You are my chief-my lord. Your fate is my fate." Na-meokee spoke proudly.

"But, why should you share the dark fate of Metamora?" asked the Wampanoug brave. "Seek the colony, and ask the protection of the chief, Winslow. His heart has always been kind to the red-man. He will protect the wife of Metamora."

"Why should Nameokee seek safety?" exclaimed the wife of the relichief. "Her life is bound up in that of Metamora. Life would have no joy where he is not. She will stay and die with him."

"No, Nameokee, it can not be," replied the chief, "the pale-faces thirst for my blood only, and will not seek thy life."

"My chief, think not that they will spare any of thy race!" cried Nameokee. "Besides, I can not leave thee."

"Away, Nameokee!" exclaimed the chief, rising to his feet; "the pule-tures will soon track the panther to his lair. Away ere it is too late."

"Kill me, but do not drive me from you!" cried the Indian wife in agony.

"Nameshee," sail Metamora, sally, "thou art the sole remaining the that binds me to earth. I can not bear to see thee perion by the knives of the maddened white skins, when they discover our hiding-place. Your precence unmans me and makes me like a child. The pule-faces will scorn me and I would show them how a Wampanong meets his death. You must away."

The agony that shook the stout heart of the Wampanoag Chief was terrible. Death Itself could not have inflicted greater tosture, than this parting.

"If Meteurera drives Nameokee from him she will rush upon the knives of the prie-faces when they advance, and die at his feet," sail the Indian wite, and the air of determination with which she uttered the speech told plainly that she would keep her word.

"My own Nameokee!" said Metamora, proudly.

shalt have thy wish. I will not drive thee from me."

At this moment a warrior rushed into the wigwam; the blood was streaming freely from a terrible gash upon his naked Dreast.

"Metamora!" cried the Inlian, "save thyself! The whiteskins are alvancing!" And then the brave dashed forth, and s. : ght safety in flight.

The report of distant shots receiving through the forest fold the chief phainly that danger was indeed at hand.

"Way should we wait the coming of the pale-faces?" cried Nameokee; "let us fly!"

"Figa is in vain!" exclaime? Metamora; "we are in the Share of the while hunters, who will soon strike their prey."

Az in to the cars of the Indians came the sounds that de-Lote I the near approach of their dread enemy.

"The while-skins come!" cried Nameokee in terror.

"Ay, the while surkes are again in the thicket, in the grass and in the leaves?" exclaimed the chief, wildly. "But the last bird of the Wampanong shall not beg nor bow to the pricf.c.s." And frein from his girdle, Metamora drew the keen-C'z l limiting-kinie, and let his rifle fall to the ground.

"I un lersteed!" cried the Indian wife; "strike thy knife to Lay in I would not sarvive thee!"

"Cand that hak death caluly in the free?" questioned the Ciri " Last thou no fear?"

"The is no believes in death at thy hands," said Name-

Cher, Standy: " stade bally !"

"Kan har har the new dethroned king, in a virial distribute. "Tarn thy face toward the spirit-hand. Let the pare in define assend to Manitou, for thou will soon be المدال المال المال المال

Me tamora raised his arm to strike, while Nameokee knelt to receive the death-stroke. There was no fear in the free of the Indian woman.

For a moment the chief looked into the calm face of the kneeling woman, and then Lis resolution failed him. He dropped his arm in despair.

"My arm is pulsie i," he cried. "I can not strike!"

More shots rung out on the air, followed by the triumphant shout of the advancing whites.

"Why does Metamera hesitate?" asked the heroic wife. "Strike, while I offer a prayer to Maniton for thy sake."

Again the short of the whites rung on the air.

- "They come!" cried Metamora, in despair, "and shall she live to be their slave?"
- "The heart of Metamora is too weak!" cried the undaunted woman; "let him be a man and strike!"

The cries of the pale-faces came nearer and nearer.

"Maniton receive thee in his bosom!" cried the chief, wildly. Then, with his powerful arm, he drove the long knife to the heart of the wife of his bosom.

A single convulsive groan, and the Indian woman sunk on her face, dead, at the feet of the Wampanong chief.

For a moment, Metamora gized upon the body of the wife he had loved so well. Then, with a cry of despair, he thrust the long knift, dripping red with Name kee's blood, back into his belt, and snatched his rifle from the ground.

"Now, cursed pale faces!" he cried, "death to him who stands in the path of Metamora!"

Forth from the wigners rushed the Forest King. Captain Courch and the secats were advanting, not three him lead paces distant. A short went up from the whites as they beheld Meamora rush from the lodge.

The balls of the coldnists not by this body around the chief, as, with a yell of dailing, he ran rapilly toward the wools to the south. Now, as in the fight, Metanoruse and to bar a charmed life. Not a single ball had too hel him.

"He will emape!" crick Charach, in anger, as he belock the swarps nearing the wood. And Charach was well aware that, once within the shelter of the thicket, it would be no cary matter to capture the savage.

Metamera felt that there was a chance for life. Exultingly he rong out the war-wheep of the Wampanoags, when, forth them the forest before him stepped the Mohegan, Agawam.

"Dig of a Wampinouz, prepare to die!" he exclaimed.

"Wint mean you, Namattah?" cried Metamora, still ad-Yancing.

"Namettah no more!" cried the chief, "but Agawam, the Managen! I have the single gibitd, Nameokee; I have betrayed you to the white-skins!"

"Deg of an Indian I" excluded Metamora, fiercely, "Nalinite -- "

The Moheran did not wait to hear more, but with a cry of rare, fired. The shot tumble i Metamora upon his knees, Arwam alvan of with a yell of triumph. With a mighty of the Metamora ranksed his ride and fired. Agawam, the Moheran, shot through the heart—his yell of triumph choked in his throat by the death-rattle—fell forward on his face, checking the earth in the agony of death.

With a shout of explication Metamora greeted the fall of the man that had be revel him. Twas the last sound that ever caracti multiplique of the red chief.

In a last effect to straggle against the death so rapidly approached the line, the Indian staggered to his feet as if to confront the feet surr unded him; then he fell heavily to the ground, dead.

The Forest King was no more.

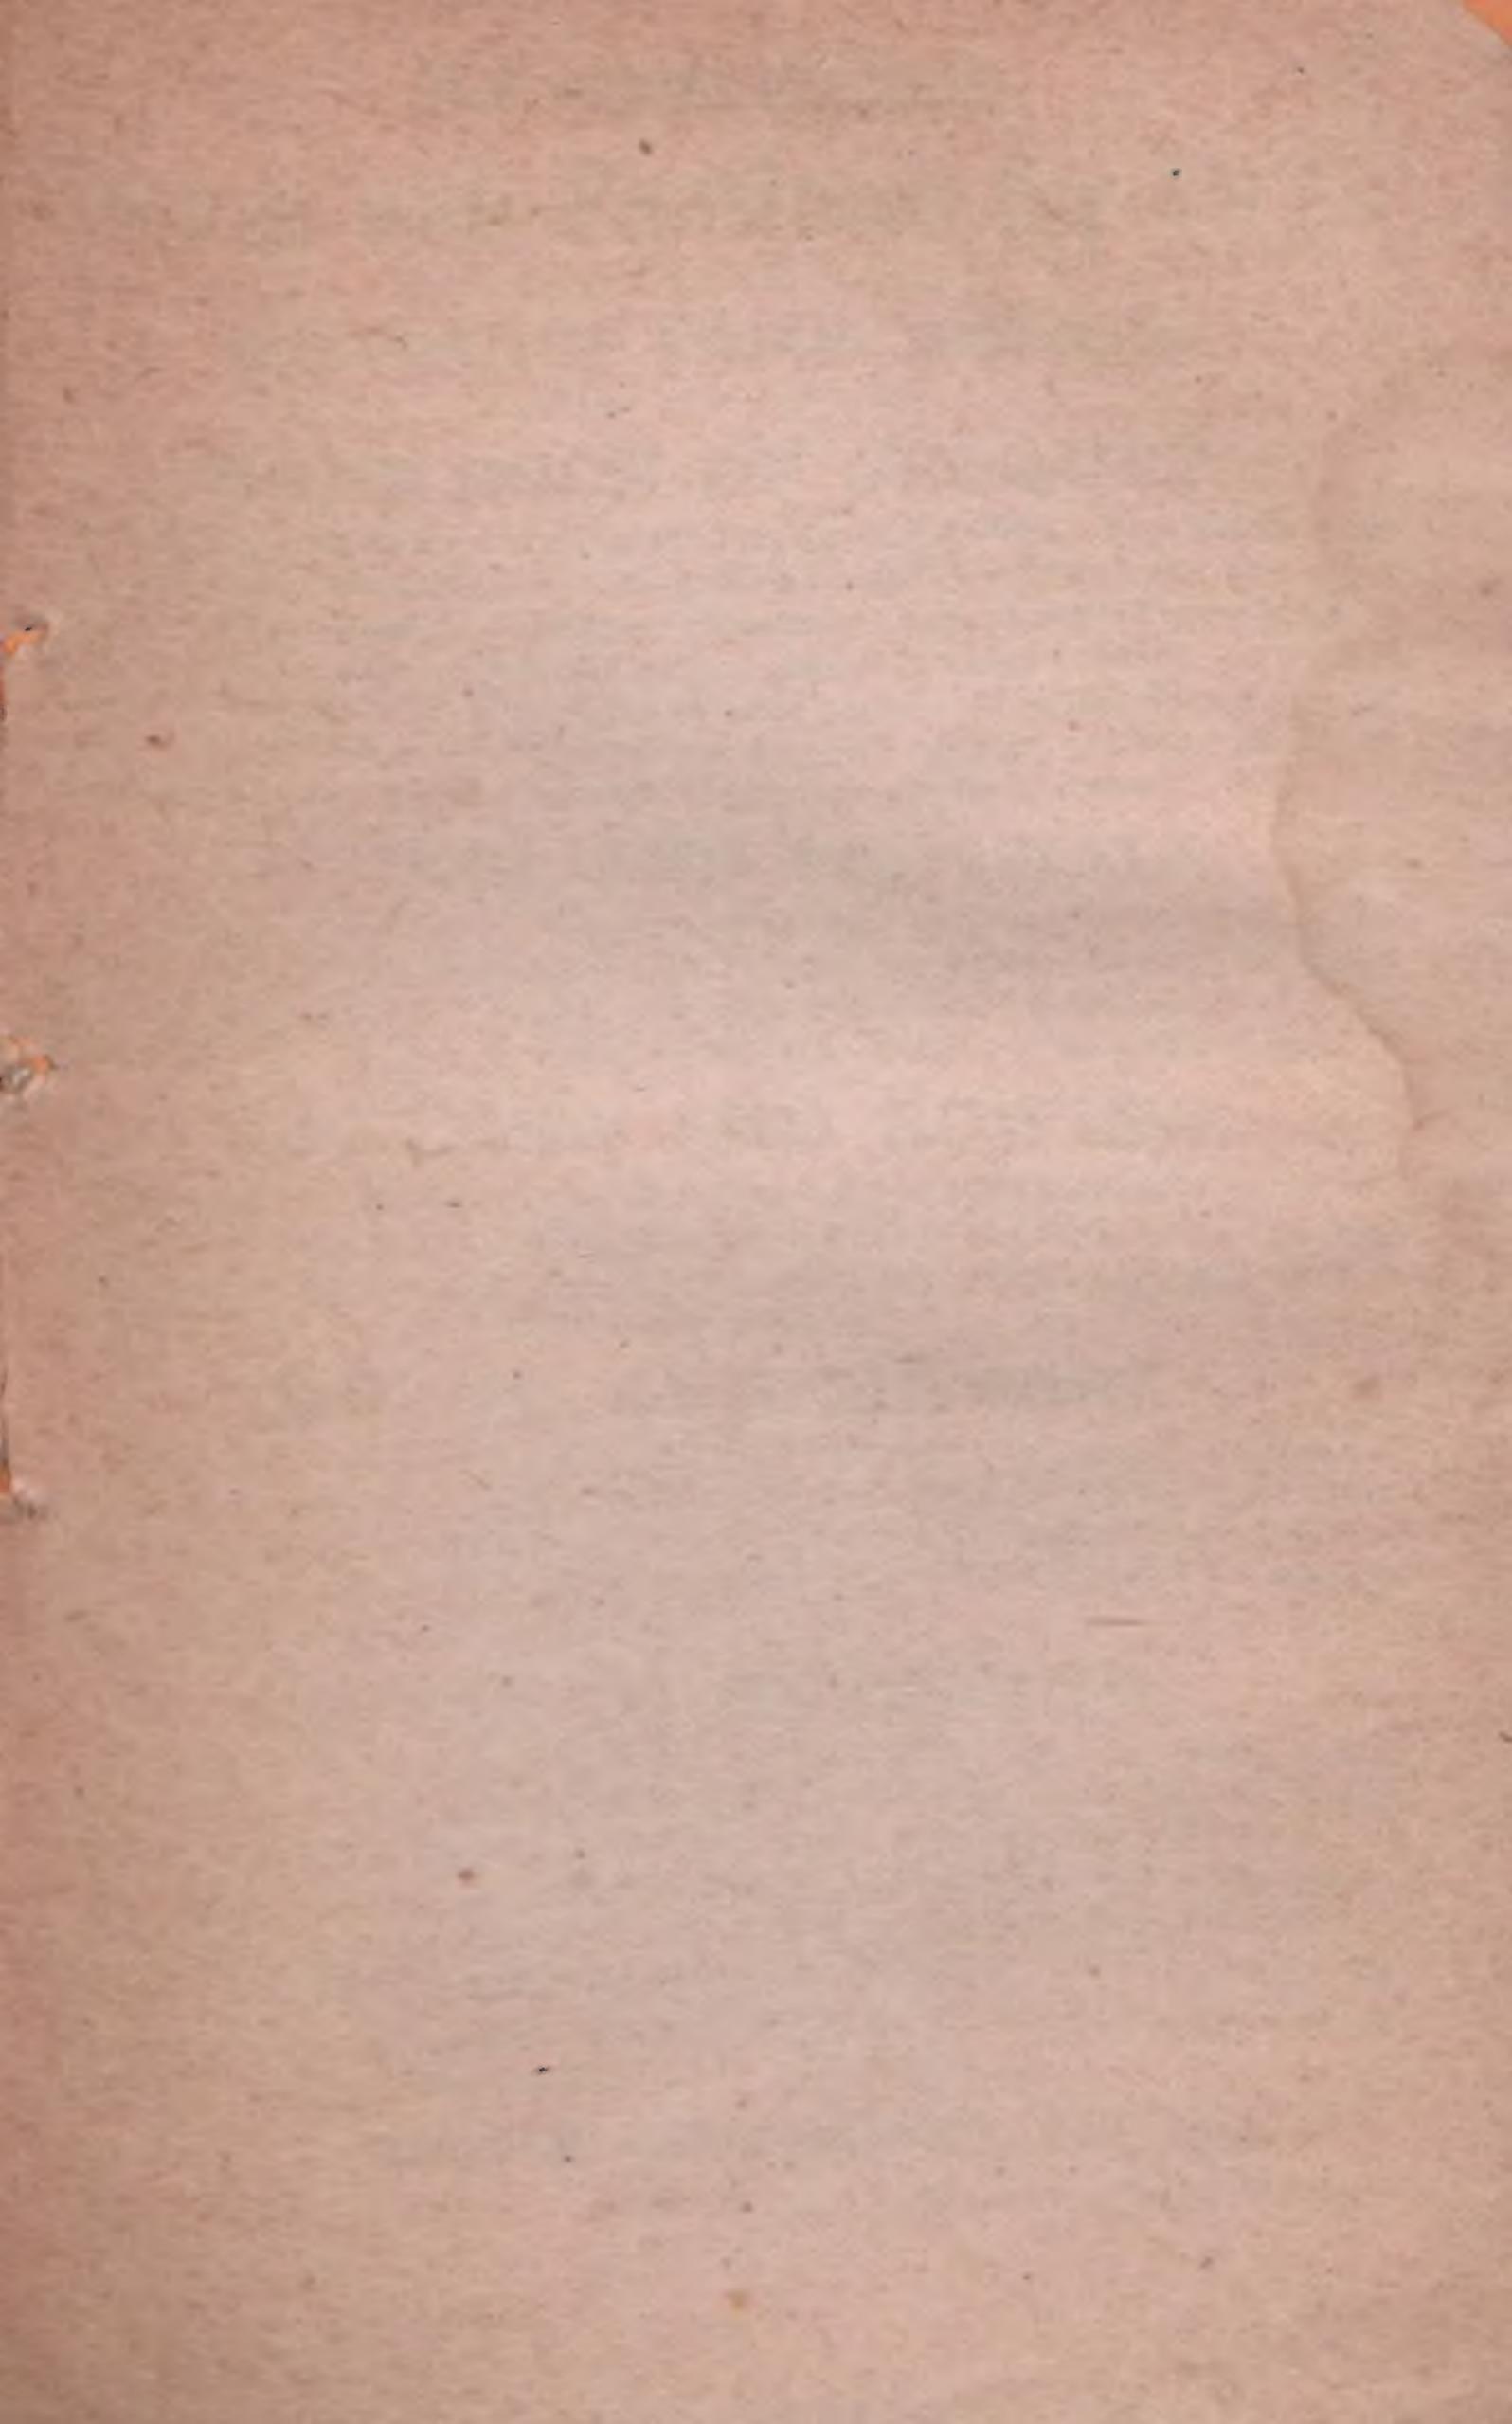

Six no miles after that described night in the swamp, Mand Golden Land Land to with of Rou'en Hamon I, captain in the colden Land Land to with a man happen I throughout all New Rog-land New Log-land N

The last well though should be to find father in that he say is the regioned a treasure worth that a father in the countries of the part of the hand of him who have a father in the same who

Lell ber beart's purest affections.

Great was the rejoicing, and hilarious the merry-making over the nuptials! The staid Puritans, for a day, seemed to drop their masks and to let human nature assert itself; and none were more hilarious than Euoch Andrews, the Plymouth scout.

THE END.

STANDARD

Games and Pastimes for 1870

BEADLE'S DIME SERIES.

HAND-BOOK OF CROQUET.

A complete guide to the Principles and Practice of the Game. This popular pastime has, during the few years of its existence, rapidly outgrown the first vague and imperfect rules and regulations of its inventor; and, as almost every house at which it is played adopts a different code of laws, it becomes a difficult matter for a stranger to assimilate his play to that of other people. It is, therefore, highly desirable that one uniform system should be generally adopted, and hence the object of this work is to establish a recognized method of playing the game.

CRICKET AND FOOT-BALL.

A desirable Cricketer's Companion, containing complete instructions in the elements of Bowling, Batting and Fielding: also the Revised Laws of the game; Remarks on the Duties of Umpires; the Mary-le-Bone Cricket Club Rules and Regulations; Bets, etc., etc. By Henry Chadwick, author of "Base-Ball Player."

YACHTING AND ROWING.

This volume will be found very complete as a guide to the conduct of watercraft, and full of interesting information alike to the amateur and the novice. The chapter referring to the recent great rowing race of the Oxford and Cambridge clubs, on the Thames, will be found particularly interesting.

RIDING AND DRIVING.

A sure guide to correct Horsemanship, with complete directions for the road and field; and a specific section of directions and information for female equestrians. Drawn largely from "Stonehenge's" fine manual, this volume will be found all that can be desired by those seeking to know all about the horse, and his management in harness and under the saddle.

GUIDE TO SWIMMING.

Embracing all the rules of the art for both sexes. Illustrated. By Captain Philip Peterson, comprising Advisory Instructions; Rules upon entering the water; General Directions for Swimming; Diving; how to come to the surface; Swimming on the Back; how to Swim in times of Danger; Sea-bathing—how to manage the waves, the tides, etc.; a Chapter for the Ladies; a Specimen Female Swimmingwaves, the tides, etc.; a Chapter for the Ladies; a Specimen Female Swimming-School; how to manage cases of Drowning; Dr. Franklin's "Code" for Swimmers.

For sale by all Newsdealers and Booksellers; or will be sent singly or in packages by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price—Ten Cents each.

BEADLE AND COMPANY, Publishers, 98 William Street, New York.

BEADLE'S STANDARD DIME PUBLICATIONS.

One Hundred Pages 12mo. Ten Cents Each.

Dime Novels.

- 1. Maineska.
- 2. The Privateer's Cruise.
- 3. Myra.
- 4. Alice Wilde.
- 5. The Golden Belt.
- 6. Chip, the Cave Child.
- 7. The Reefer of 76.
- 8. Seth Jones.
- 9. The Slave Sculptor.
- 10. The Backwoods Bride.
- 11. Prisoner La Vintresse.
- 19. Bill Biddon, Trapper. 13. Cedar Swamp.
- 14. Emerald Necklace,
- 15. The Frontier Angel.
- 16. Uncle Ezekiel.
- 17. Madge Wylde.
- 18. Nat Todd.
- 19. Massasoit's Daughter.
- 20. Florida.
- 21. Sybil Chase,
- 22. The Maid of Esepus.
- 23. Winifred Winthrop.
- 24. The Trail Hunters.
- 25. The Peon Prince.
- 26. Brethren of the Coast.
- 27. Daughter of Liberty.
- 28. King Barnaby. 29. The Forest Spy.
- 30. Put. Pomíret's Ward.
- 31. The Double Hero.
- 32. Irona.
- 33. Maum Guinea.
- 34. Ruth Margorie.
- 35. East and West.
- 36. Riflemen of the Miami.
- 37. Godbold, the Spy. The Wrong Man.
- The Land Claim.
- Unionist's Daughter.
- The Hunter's Cabin.
- 42. The King's Man.

 - 43. The Allens.
 - 44. Agues Falkland.
 - 45. Esther.
 - 46. Wreck of the Albian.
- 47. Tim Bumble's Charge.
- 48. Conomoo, the Huron.
- 49. The Gold Hunters.
- 50. The Biack Ship.
- 51. The Two Guards.
- 52. Single Eye. 5% Hates and Loves.
- 54. Myrtle.
- 55. Off and On.
- 56. Ahmo's Plot.
- 57. The Scout.
- 58. The Mad Hunter.
- 59, Kent, the Ranger.
- 60. Jo Daviess' Client,
- 61. Langhing Eyes.
- 52. The Unknown.
- 63. The Indian Princess. 64. Rangers of Mohawk.
- 65. The Wrecker's Prize.
- 66. The Hunter's Vow.
- 67. Indian Jim.
- 68. The Brigantine.
- 58. Black Hollow.
- 70. The Indian Queen.
- 71. The Last Trail.
- 72. The Monse Hunter.
- 13. The Silver Bugle.
- 74. Cruiser of Chesapeake.
- 75. The Hunter's Escape.
- 16. The Scout's Prize.
- 77. Quindaro.
- 78. The Rival Scouts.

- 79. Schuylkill Rangers.
- 80. Eagle Eye.
- 81. The Two Hunters.
- 82. The Mystic Cance.
- 83. The Golden Harpoon. 84. The Seminole Chief.
- 85. The Fugitives
- 86. Red Plume.
- 87. On the Deep.
- 88. Captain Molly.
- 89. Star Eyes. 90, Cast Away.
- 21. The Lost Cache.
- 92. The Twin Scouts.
- 93. The Creole Sisters.
- 94. The Mad Skipper.
- 95. Eph Peters.
- 96. Little Moccasin.
- 97. The Doonted Hunter. 98. Ruth Harland.
- 99. Overboard.
- 100. Karalbo. 101. Maid of Wyoming.
- 102. Hearts Forever.
- 103. Big Foot, the Guide.
- 104. Guilty or Not Guilty.
- 105. The Man in Green.
- 106. Simple Phil.
- 107. The Peddler Spy.
- 108. The Lost Ship.
- 109, Kidnapped,
- 110, The Hidden Home. 111. The Shawnees' Foe.
- 112. The Falcon Rover.
- 113. Ruttlepate.
- 114. Ned Starling.
- 115. The Sons of Liberty.
- 116. Port at Last. 117. The Mohegan Maiden.
- 118. The Water Walf.
- 119. The Five Champions. 120. The Hunchback.
- 121. Valled Benefactress.
- 122. Barden, the Ranger.
- 123. The Missing Bride.
- 194, Sumter's Scouts.
- 125. The Hunted Life.
- 176, Old Jupe.
- Bald Eagle.
- 125. The Gulch Miners.
- 129. Bincheyes,
- 130. Brave Heart.
- 131. Wrecker's Daughter.
- 132. Old Honesty.
- 133. Yankee Eph. 134. Foul-weather Jack.
- 135. The Cherokee Chief.
- 136. The Indian-Hunters.
- 137. The Traiter Spy.
- 138. Tim, the Scout.
- 139. The Border Foes.
- 140, Sheet-Anchor Tom.
- 141. The Helpless Hand. 142. The Sagainure of Saco.
- 141, The Swamp Scout.
- 144. The Prairie Trappers.
- 145. The Mountaineer. . . 146. Border Bessie.
- 147. Maid of the Mountain.
- 148, Ontward Bound.
- 151. The Two Trails.
- 153. Mohawk Nat.
- 154. Rob Ruskin.
- 156. The Quakerens Spy.
- 5. Wintield Scott,
- The Hunter's Pledge. 150. The Scalp-Hunters.*
- 152. The Planter Pirate.
- 155. The White Squaw.
- 157. The Indian Avenger, | 15. Ulysses S. Grant.

175. The Prairie Rifles. 176. The Trader Spy.

174. Queen of the Woods.

177. The Pale-face Squaw. 178, The Prairie Bride.

158. The Blue Anchor.

160. The Swamp Rifles.

161. The Lake Rangers.

162. The Border Rivala.

163. Job Dean, Trapper.

165. The Unseen Hand.

166. Red-Skin's Pledge.

168. The Silent Hunter.

170. The Border Avengers.

169. The White Cance.

171. The Silent Slaver.

172. Deapard, the Spy.

173. The Red Coyote-

164. The Giant Chief.

167. Shadow Jack.

159, Snowbird.

- 179. The White Vulture,
- 180. Giant Pete, Patriot. 181. Old Kyle, the Trailer, 2. Recipe Book.
- 182. Jabez Hawk. 183. The Phantom Ship.
- 184. The Red Rider.
- 185. The Dacotah Scourge 186. The Red Scalper.
- 187. The Outlaws' Plot.
- 188. The Black Rover-189. The Yellow Chief.
- 190, Phantom Horseman.
- 191. Red Slayer. 192. The Specter Skipper.
- 193. The Swamp Riders.
- 194. Graylock, the Guide. 195, The First Trail.
- 196. Eagle Plume. 197. Shawnee Scout.
- 198. Burt Bunker.
- 199. Red Outlaw.
- Av. Prairie Pathfinder. 901: White Serpent-
- 202. Phantom Foe.
- 203. Masked Gulde.
- Dime School Series.
- 1. American Speaker.
- 2. National Speaker.
- 3. Patriotic Speaker. 4. Comic Speaker.
- 5. Elocutionist.
- Humorous Speaker.
- 7. Standard Speaker. S. Stump Speaker.
- 9. Juvenile Speaker.
- 10. Spread-Eagle Speaker. 11. Dime Debater.
- DIALOGUES, NOS. 1 to 9. Melndist.

School Melodist.

- Dime Biographics.
- Garlbaldi.
- 2. Daniel Boone, 3. Kit Caroon.
- 4. Authory Wayne. 5. David Crockett.
- 7. Pontinc.
- 8. John C. Fremont,
- 9. John Paul Jones. 10. Marquis de Lafayette.
 - II. Tecumseh. 12. George B. McClellan.
- Pigrant Brownlow. 14. Abraham Lincoln.
- Novels marked with a star are double numbers, 200 pages. Price 20 cents.
- For sale by all Newsdeaters; or sent, Post-Pain, to any address, on receipt of price.

- Ball-room Companion. Book of Pedestrianism. Book of Croquets

Dime Game-Books

Base-Ball Player for 1870.

Cricket and Foot-ball.

Curling and Skating.

- Yachting and Rowing. Riding and Driving.
- Guide to Swimming. Chesa Instructor.
 - Dime Hand-Books.
- 1. Letter-Writer.
- 2. Book of Etiquette. 3. Book of Verses.
- 4. Book of Dreams.
- 5. Fortune-Taller, 6. Ladies' Letter-Writer
- 7. Lovers' Casket.
- Dime Family Series.
- 1. Cook Book.
- 3. Housewife's Manual.
- 4. Family Physician. 5. Dressmaking, Millinery.

Dime Song Books. Song Books, Nos, I to 25,

- Pocket Songsters, I to 6. Miscellancous.
- DIME FICTION, I to 9. DIME LIBRARY, 1 to L.
- DIME TALES, Nos. 1 to 18. OF BOOKS OF FUN. NOS. 1 to 3. House that Jack Built.

Grant's Report. Sherman's Report

Robinson Crusce (Hlust'd).

- American Tales.
- SECOND BERIES-15C BACH. L Loyal Heart.
- 2. The Trail Hunter.
- 3. Pirates of the Prairies.
- 4. Trapper's Daughter.
- & Pathaway. 8. Whitelaw.
- The White Wissed.
- Hirl, the Hunchtsack.
- The Red Warrior.
- 10. Quaker Saul. . 11. Mountain Max.
- 12. Thayendanegus. Ill Redpath, the Avenger.
- 14. Prairie-Flower. 15. Redpath, the Avenger.
- 16. Tiger-Slayer. 17. Red Ralph, the Ranger. 18. Silent Rifleman.
- 19. Flying Horseman. 20. The Gold-Guide-21. The Death Track-
- FIRST SERIES, NO. 1 to 44. 25-Cent Novels.
- 195 TO 150 OCTATO PAGES. 1. Sybil Campbell. 2. The Prophetic Traines.

l. The Gipsy Queen's Vew.

- 4. Unmarked. Fifty Cent Books. The Figure Eight.
- The Dead Letter, Romance of Green Beal. Who Was Hat
- Our New States, etc.
- BEADLE AND COMPANY, Publishers, 98 William St., N. Y.